"A joint select committee, composed of three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is created and is authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874, with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District. Neither the cost of construction nor of maintenance of any building erected or owned by the United States for the purpose of transacting therein the business of the Government of the United States shall be considered by said committee. And in event any money may be or at any time has been by Congress or otherwise, found due, either legally or morally, from the one to the other, on account of loans, advancements, or improvements made, upon which interest has not been paid by either to the other, then such sums as have been or may be found due from one to the other, shall be considered as bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the time when the principal should, either legally or morally, have been paid, until actually paid. And the committee shall also ascertain and report what surplus, if any, the District of Columbia has to its credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States which has been acquired by taxation or from licenses. And the said committee shall report its findings relative to all the matters hereby referred to it to the Senate and House, respectively, on or before the first Monday in February, 1923. The chairman or acting chairman of said committee hereby is empowered to administer oaths or affirmations. The committee also is empowered to compel witnesses to attend its meetings and to testify, and also to compel the production of such books and papers as it may deem desirable. Any person who has been duly notified to appear before the committee either as witness or witness duces tecum, and fails so to do, shall be deemed guilty of contempt of Congress, and therefore may be punished to such extent as either the Senate or the House may determine; and said committee shall determine whether the proceeding for contempt shall lie with the House or the Senate. The committee may employ such accountants and stenographers to assist in the work as may be necessary, but the same qualifications for such accountants shall be required as was required of accountants by section 6 of the act of June 30, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia and for other purposes," and no one shall be so employed as accountant who is or has been heretofore an officer or employee of the District of Columbia or the United States. No employee of said committee shall be paid more than $25 a day while actually at work. The Attorney General of the United States hereby is authorized and directed to assign a competent attorney from his regular force of attorneys to represent the United States before said committee; and any Member of Congress shall be permitted to examine any witness and argue any question before the committee. For the payment of salaries of accountants and stenographers, for printing and binding, and other necessary expenses of the committee, there is appropriated 40 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, the sum of $20,000, to be paid out upon vouchers approved by the chairman or acting chairman of the committee."—begs leave to submit the following report:

TITLE I.—FUNCTIONS OF THE COMMITTEE.

The committee met on July 1, 1922, organized, and elected LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, a Senator from the State of Colorado, as chairman. Since said date numerous meetings and hearings have been held in the city of Washington. At a subsequent meeting, the chairman reported the appointment of C. Brooks Fry as secretary, under the authority conferred upon him by the committee, and the appointment was confirmed.

In accordance with the powers conferred under the terms of said act of June 29, 1922, the committee employed Messrs. Haskins & Sells, accountants and auditors, with general offices in New York City and Baltimore, Md., who have stated the account between the United States and the District of Columbia, in accordance with the instructions of the committee, as herein-after disclosed.

Among others there were called into conference the following: James F. Oyster, Cuno H. Rudolph, and Col. C. Keller, Commissioners of the District of Columbia; D. J. Donovan, District auditor; Herman J. Galloway, special assistant to the Attorney General, selected pursuant to the provisions of the act to represent the United States; Earl Taggart, of the general accounting office; L. G. Graesle, of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, Treasury Department; and the Citizens' Joint Committee of the District of Columbia. The committee also had before it certain Members of Congress, including Senators JONES of Washington and GLASS and Representatives CRAMTON, and JOHNSON of Kentucky.

Messrs. Haskins & Sells made a preliminary report in writing on November 20, 1922, and filed a final report, containing conclusions, recommendations, and tables, on January 11, 1923. Subsequently written reports were received from Messrs. Galloway, Taggart, and Donovan, the citizens' joint committee, and Mr. Thomas Hodgson.

Your committee, after careful consideration of the entire subject, including more particularly the matters referred to in said reports of the accountants and others, has come to certain definite conclusions which are contained in this report.

At the outset the committee considers a brief statement of the peculiar relations existing between the Federal and the District Governments to be not only helpful, but necessary, in order to comprehend fully and fairly the questions involved.

Washington, the Capital of the Nation, is a city altogether under the control of the United States Government. Its administrative officials are appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, and its laws are enacted by the Congress. From the start it has been the desire of that legislative body, as well as for that matter of the residents of the city and certain officeholders here who maintain a legal residence elsewhere, to make it a beauty spot of America of which our citizens might be justly proud. Hence the expenditures for public improvements have been inordinate as compared to those of other communities of approximately the same size and population.

In some cases these expenditures have been authorized upon the recommendation of the District Commissioners, who are local residents selected by the President. In many other instances the Congress in the exercise of its rightful prerogative, refusing to follow such recommendations, has appropriated more or less than desired, as the case may be, and for different purposes.

From 1878 to 1921, as a rule, 50 per cent of all the District expenses were borne by the Federal Government, and 50 per cent came from the residents of the city. However, the law at present provides that the share of the United States shall be 40 per cent, and that of the District 60 per cent. As in the case of the actual appropriations themselves, these proportions have been fixed by the Congress, in which citizens of Washington have no representation.

For many years liberal appropriations were made to carry out the program of city beautification, during which period of time the District was in debt to the Federal Government. The accountant's report shows that prior to 1914 there was a balance due the United States, but that at the end of that fiscal year the District had a credit balance of $68,300.

Then came the war period and expenditures for further development were necessarily limited, yet no reduction was made in the rate of tax assessments. The District tax receipts increased, as a matter of fact; the money was deposited in the United States Treasury and a surplus created, largely due, as will be observed, from failure to continue the proper extension of streets, their paving and repaving, the building of public schools, and the upkeep of other city activities corresponding to the growth of the city.

It is with this surplus that your committee has to deal, among other things. On the one hand it is urged by some that the spirit of the entire system of fiscal relations between the two Governments, existing since 1878, was violated by the creation of such a fund. It is pointed out that had the 50-50 rule been adhered to, as provided by law, there would be no such surplus, as the money in question would have been expended for schools, streets, and other municipal activities and improvements. It is therefore claimed that the District is entitled to the entire fund, which should be applied to the maintenance of its government and other activities, and should be matched by Federal money, according to law.

On the other hand, it has been asserted that the District has no legal claim against any money now in the United States Treasury which has been accumulated in this fashion.

It is argued that there is no law upon which the District can predicate a legal claim to any sums of money in the Treasury, whether ascertained as to amount or not; such a claim is, to say the least, unenforceable at law and hence equitable or moral in its nature. Being merely equitable it follows from this reasoning that equitable defenses, counterclaims, offsets, and credits may be asserted to reduce the amount of said surplus, to wipe it out altogether, or possibly to show that the District is equitably or morally indebted in large sums to the Federal Government. Parenthetically, no one has urged before your committee, irrespective of the magnitude of the claim or offset insisted upon, that, inasmuch as the equitable balance might be considered as being in favor of the United States, collection of such balance from the District, therefore, should be recommended to the Congress.

The foregoing reveals the occasion for the creation of your committee, and is illuminating when the language of the act is under consideration, to determine the scope of the committee's work and the nature of the report which should properly be made to the Congress.

Briefly, it is the understanding of your committee that it is required to make such findings and recommendations as would bear directly upon this primary question of the District surplus, and could be used by the Congress, in its discretion, as a basis for settling for all time the claims and contentions arising out of this matter.

Of course, the scope of the committee's work has also been determined in other ways, including a close examination of the language of the act. On this point the committee submits its views, subject to the judgment of the Congress. A statement of same is deemed necessary at this time because it has been contended that under the language of the act this is little more than a fact-finding committee, and that its object is mainly accomplished if it furnishes the Congress with a vast array of tabulated figures from which Members of that body may draw their own conclusions, with few, if any specific recommendations on the part of the committee. The following portion of the act is emphasized in this connection:

"A joint select committee * * * is directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874, with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District."

Certain witnesses have contended that this language properly includes all expenditures made by the United States for maintaining, upbuilding, and beautifying the District since July 1, 1874, whether or not the same had ever been considered by the Congress as in any way affecting the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States; and that it includes such activities as the erection of the Lincoln Memorial, statues of national heroes, the Congressional Library, and various other large expenditures.

At least one of the witnesses has declared that, while it was not incumbent upon the committee to recommend that such items as the Lincoln Memorial be considered under the above language, as matters to which the 50-50 or 60-40 ratio was properly applicable, yet it was the duty of the committee to report on all such items for the consideration of the Congress in the determination of this question.

Another witness, Congressman JOHNSON of Kentucky, after mentioning the Lincoln Memorial and similar public works, stated that "It is my unqualified opinion that the cost of the Congressional Library, and everything in it, and 3 per cent interest, must be offset against any claim of surplus. This language is mighty plain, when you come to read it carefully."

Other witnesses have insisted with equal emphasis that such things should not be considered for a moment in a report on the fiscal relations existing between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government.

Your committee has had the subject under advisement, and in this connection called upon Mr. Galloway, as the representative of the Department of Justice and of the United States, for his opinion. The committee submits to the judgment of the Senate and of the House of Representatives its conclusion that this provision of the act should not be given a strict literal interpretation, in disregard of the purpose and intention of the act as a whole and of other provisions of the act. In his opinion Mr. Galloway states:

"I am fortified in this conclusion by a consideration of the act as a whole, the title of which indicates that it is an act dealing with proportional appropriations for the Government and other activities of the District of Columbia. It is an act directed wholly toward the consideration of those things which are primarily and solely for the interest of the District of Columbia. All of the act preceding the paragraph quoted deals with an arrangement for proportional appropriations and for expenses primarily for the support of the District of Columbia. The committee is created 'to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874.' All past legislation upon the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States, so far as I have been able to ascertain, involves expenditures primarily for the benefit or for the maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying of the District of Columbia and conducting its activities, and Congress seems to have had such things always in mind when it considered these fiscal relations.

"There is nothing in any of the acts indicating that Congress ever intended that such expenditures as for the Lincoln Memorial or the Congressional Library were made for the primary purpose of beautifying the District of Columbia, and even some of those urging a construction which would include such expenditures have stated that they do not think that the District should bear any proportion thereof. Can it be logically contended that Congress was directing this committee to do a useless thing? Further, should not this act have such construction as would make it reasonable and susceptible of execution? If it is held to include all of these expenditures it is conceded by most all that the task would be so enormous and the expense so great that the same could not be accomplished either within the time fixed by Congress or with the amount of money appropriated. All of these things sustain the conclusion which I have heretofore expressed that this act should not have a strict literal interpretation in disregard of the act as a whole. It is my opinion that this requires your committee to report to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether expended primarily for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District or primarily for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of the District, excluding the cost of construction or of maintaining any building erected or owned by the United States for the purpose of transacting therein the business of the Government of the United States and that your report need not include expenditures which do have the effect of upbuilding or beautifying the District of Columbia but which were erected by Congress primarily for another purpose and which incidentally did in fact upbuild or beautify said District."

In a few words, your committee believes that the language contained in the clause in question, which reads "A joint select committee * * * is directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874," not only defines but limits the scope of the committee's investigation to matters that properly pertain to such fiscal relations; that the words "for the purpose" mean "for the purpose," and not "for the secondary purpose" or "having the incidental effect"; that in the act reference to the surplus is made in apt words; that the act must be construed as a whole; that the task assigned must be considered as possible of accomplishment; and that when all these factors are taken into consideration, including the occasion for the creation of the committee, the intent and meaning of all the language of the act is clear.

Your committee is anxious to carry out completely the mandate of the Congress, and hence deems it its duty to call attention to the various constructions which have been urged and to set forth its conclusions in some detail.

As a part of the findings required under the law, your committee has included in this report tabulated figures, secured as a result of its inquiry into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the two Governments from July 1, 1874, to June 30, 1922, inclusive, which show what sums have been expended by the United States and the District of Columbia, respectively, for the purposes enumerated.

On the merits of the particular question which has been used as an illustration, it is the sense of your committee that no portion of expenditures made wholly out of Federal funds for the purpose of the construction of national memorials or monuments in honor of any national hero or character, or in commemoration of any national event shall, in making up the fiscal balance, be chargeable to the District of Columbia.

TITLE II.—WORK OF THE COMMITTEE.

At the beginning of its labors, your committee had its attention called to the fact that investigations had already been made under authority of the Congress, intending to cover the fiscal relations between the two governments during the period up to June 30, 1911, and that the reports on such investigations had been acted upon by the Congress. Messrs. Haskins & Sells were, therefore, directed to make a detailed audit and examination of the District accounts from June 30, 1911, to June 30, 1922, inclusive, and in addition to bring to the consideration of the committee any other items pertinent to the inquiry to which their attention was called or which came under their observation, and which existed during the period between July 1, 1874, and June 30, 1911. This detailed audit has been made, and a report submitted by the accountants, which includes references to certain outstanding items arising prior to the latter date.

It has been suggested, however, that the investigations made relative to these earlier years were not as thorough or comprehensive as they should have been; that errors may not have been detected in every instance, and that the reports of the investigators could not be considered complete. Your committee, therefore, after the report of Messrs. Haskins & Sells was received, seriously reconsidered the advisability, not to say the necessity, under the direction of the act of June 29, 1922, of authorizing the same kind of an intensive audit over the period already covered by these prior investigations. In that event it would have been necessary to ask the Congress for a year's additional time, at least, within which to make a final report, and for an additional appropriation of many thousand dollars. As will be recalled, $20,000 was originally set aside for this purpose, a small portion of which remains unexpended.

In this respect also your committee desires to submit its conclusions with a brief statement of its reasons to the judgment of the Congress.

The act of March 3, 1909, enumerated certain advances made from time to time to the District government and directed that within five years the money should be repaid by the District into the United States Treasury, together with interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum. The principal of the sum refunded was $2,665,081.81, and the interest amounted to $101,313.28. It was, therefore, desired to clear up all remaining questions, and certain accountants were detailed by the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses, through the proper committee, to make an audit which would be final and conclusive.

One of these investigations was made into the general account of the District of Columbia with the United States by Messrs. L. Scott Mayes and J. R. Mayes, accountants who were employed by and reported to the special committee investigating the affairs of the District of Columbia under House Resolutions 154 and 200, of the Sixty-second Congress, and House Resolution 203, of the Sixty-third Congress (H. Doc. No. 1627). Said report stated the balance in the general fund of the District of Columbia on July 1, 1911, and was described by the committee as "a finished report." This was an investigation of the accounts between the two governments as they relate to the revenues of the District and to the appropriations made from the revenues of the United States to the District and the advances made from both by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, as authorized by the various acts of Congress since the passage of the act of June 11, 1878, and to including the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911; and also all appropriations and advances made by the United States to the District of Columbia from June 20, 1874, to June 30, 1878, inclusive, which affect the account between the two Governments. Said investigation required approximately three years' time and resulted in the discovery of certain items in considerable amount for which reimbursement was required by the United States from the District of Columbia. These were as follows:

Reimbursement on account unpaid balance of advances to defray District expenses for fiscal year 1878, required under act of July 11, 1919	$75,000.00
Reimbursement on account of advances for support public schools, 1877, required under act of July 11, 1919	75,000.00
Reimbursement on account of constructing school building in Georgetown, required under act of July 11, 1919	50,865.00
Reimbursement for interest on 3.65 District of Columbia bonds for 1877 and 1878, required under act of Mar. 4, 1915	586,067.23
Reimbursement on account of Freedman's Hospital, required under act of Aug. 1, 1914	37,996.70
Reimbursement on account of support of insane in St. Elizabeths Hospital, 1881 to 1911, act of Mar. 4, 1913	719,536.07
Reimbursement on account of support of insane in St. Elizabeths Hospital, as in full, required under the act of July 1, 1916	282,764.26
Reimbursement on account of construction of District jail, required under act of Aug. 31, 1918	125,000.00
Reimbursement on account of advances to pay teachers in public schools in 1874, required under act of Aug. 31, 1918	97,740.50
Making a total of	2,049,969.76

A second investigation was made by W. W. Spalding, accountant, who examined the miscellaneous and general revenue accounts between the United States and the District of Columbia from 1874 to the date of the inquiry. These accounts were checked up carefully by Mr. Spalding, who was employed intermittently between the years 1913 and 1918. His recommendations were in every instance favorably acted upon by the Congress, and certain refunds to the United States were required from the District, as follows:

Reimbursements account of Washington Market Co., rentals 1878 to 1914, required under act of Mar. 4, 1915	$158,437.50
Reimbursement account of fines in United States cases in criminal division of Supreme Court, District of Columbia, between July 1, 1878, and June 30, 1908, required under act of Apr. 17, 1917	24,300.76
Reimbursement account of fines in United States branch of police court between July 1, 1878, and Jan. 1, 1902, required under act of Apr. 17, 1917	211,450.12
Making a total of	394,188.38

Mr. Spalding appeared before your committee and testified that the work was done as thoroughly as practicable, but that he believed at the conclusion of his labors, and believes now, that certain other items, totaling possibly $60,000 or $70,000, should be investigated. Later on he furnished your committee with a memorandum of these items, and it was disclosed that, except in three instances, they had already been considered by it.

These three remaining items have since been investigated by your committee and are set forth under the head of Title IV of this report.

As heretofore stated, Messrs. Haskins & Sells were also required to call attention to any items noted by them arising during the period between July 1, 1874, and June 30, 1911, which might have a bearing on this investigation. In a summary of their report, dated January 17, 1923, they state:

"Certain of the items referred to in the foregoing synopsis would be affected by transactions prior to July 1, 1911. In order to complete the inquiry into such questions it would therefore be necessary that the examination be extended prior to July 1, 1911, so as to cover the entire period comprehended by the act creating your committee."

But as to each of said items arising prior to 1911 your committee has found, as will be hereinafter shown under the head of Title IV, that they were properly charged, and that there is nothing due from one government to the other. The ones concerning which adjustment is recommended by your committee, and which are listed under Title III, have no possible relation to transactions prior to June 30, 1911. Also, the committee's consultants, Messrs. Galloway, Taggart, Donovan, and the citizens' joint committee, are in complete agreement as to the existence of the surplus, and practically in accord as to the propriety of rejecting possible equitable credits between 1874 and 1911, suggested for consideration by the committee's accountants.

Again, your committee is advised that many of the official records and memoranda necessary to a satisfactory audit have long since been destroyed, and that, however great might be the diligence of the accountants, a complete and thorough audit for the entire period in question could hardly be secured.

We submit that the above statement of what the facts actually are speaks for itself, and we are content to leave it to the judgment of the Congress whether or not another audit at this late date would be at all justified. As practical men we can not escape the conclusion that the investigations made in this and prior audits are as thorough as required for the purposes of the act, and that, in the absence of certain records, they are as satisfactory and complete as any audit could ever be.

No witness appearing before the committee has testified that a further detailed audit would be advisable, while on the other hand the citizens' joint committee, Representative Johnson of Kentucky, and Mr. Thomas Hodgson, an employee of the Treasury Department who stated the account of the District for more than 30 years, have all spoken against the necessity for or advisability of the same. No witness who has testified before the committee has been able to bring up any items of dispute which have not been investigated.

Your committee, therefore, believes that a further detailed audit would be a decided waste of time and money, and would serve no good purpose. Neither is the same necessary, according to our belief, under the provisions of the act of June 29, 1922, which must be considered with reference to their practical effect.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that the investigations already made be taken as a basis upon which definite and final action should be had by the Congress.

TITLE III.—CLAIMS RECOMMENDED FOR ADJUSTMENT.

As a result of the inquiry, your committee finds that the various items appearing in the annual appropriation bills for the District of Columbia, enacted during the entire period specified in this act, have been properly allocated between the District of Columbia and the United States, with the exception of several small items. These have either been corrected by prior action of Congress or are included under this title in this report.

Your committee also finds that certain other items, which can not properly be considered as accounting and bookkeeping errors, and which are considerably larger in amount, have either been settled by prior legislation or are covered by the recommendations contained under this title in this report.

Your committee also submits that certain additional items, which have been called into question, have been considered by its members and reported under the head of Title IV of this report, with the recommendation that they should be held to have been properly accounted for, and that no changes in the account between the District of Columbia and the United States should be made in respect to the same.

1. The committee reports, as its first finding, that at June 30, 1922, the credit balance, District of Columbia general fund, in the United States Treasury, certified to by the Comptroller General of the United States, and as shown in Exhibit A of the report of Messrs. Haskins & Sells, certified public accountants, which is $5,260.67 less than that shown by the records of the auditor of the District of Columbia. The committee understands that the difference is being investigated and will be properly adjusted.

Your committee also finds that the records of the District appropriation ledgers show encumbrances against that balance on account of unexpended appropriations, aggregate $2,077,616.24, and also further obligations to the amount of $825,603.69, which will eventually have to be paid out of this fund.

That, subject to the correctness of the liability above stated, which can be accepted for all practical purposes, the free surplus at June 30, 1922, was $4,671,196.97.

2. The accountants have called attention to certain errors in stating the account between the two governments and have recommended that the net amount of $665.46 be credited to the District. Messrs. Galloway and Taggart also suggest adjustment of these matters on the basis of figures submitted by Messrs. Haskins & Sells, and in this recommendation the committee concurs.

3. As a partial offset against these credits the committee recognizes that the United States is entitled to reimbursement on account of the $240 annual bonus paid to certain classes of District employees, and which, up to the present fiscal year, came solely from Federal funds.

The accountants, without definitely committing themselves, call attention to the fact that such general increases in compensations of certain employees have been charged wholly against Federal appropriations, while the regular salaries, other than the increases, have been charged proportionately against the United States and the District of Columbia.

Here is an evident oversight by the Congress, due, no doubt, to the fact that provisions for such bonus have been inserted from time to time in measures other than the District of Columbia bill. The appropriation act for the present fiscal year made the necessary correction as to the future. There is no doubt concerning the policy of Congress in the matter, and your committee recommends that the District should pay its proportionate share of increased compensation in such cases as enumerated by the accountants in their report. This share amounts to $191,890.35.

The above is in accordance with the recommendations of Mr. Galloway and Mr. Taggart, while Mr. Donovan and the citizen's joint committee make no argument on the question.

4. Another item of somewhat similar nature arises in connection with appropriations of $80,000 and $2,500 made in the acts of June 5, 1920, and March 4, 1921, respectively, for the purchase of land in connection with the National Zoological Park. The cost of land previously secured for this purpose was charged proportionately to the Federal and the District Governments; and your committee can see no reason for an exception in these two cases. It is believed that this is another oversight, caused by the fact that the appropriation in question was not contained in the District bill.

In this position your committee has the support of Mr. Taggart and, by inference, of the accountants. Mr. Galloway states that the moral question is the only one involved, as legally the matter is settled, while Mr. Donovan is content to leave the matter to the determination of the Congress.

The citizens' joint committee, on the other hand, advocates not only that this sum be charged wholly against the Federal Government but also that there should be a refund to the District of moneys heretofore contributed for such park purposes. Your committee, however, is unwilling to disturb the evident intention of Congress in this respect, and, in addition, believes that sufficient benefits are derived from the park by local residents to justify the District's share in the expenditures involved.

The recommendation, therefore, is that $41,500 be charged against the District as its proper proportion of such expenses.

5. The accountants show that the amount of $634.33 was paid out of Federal revenues for the relief of Eldred C. Davis on account of loss occasioned by a larceny in the office of the collector of taxes. As there is no equitable reason why the United States should have borne the entire cost, your committee recommends that $317.17, one-half of said amount, should now be charged against the District.

Mr. Taggart views the matter in this light, while Messrs. Donovan and Galloway make no recommendation. The citizens' joint committee can not understand why the District government should have anything to do with the matter.

TITLE IV.—ITEMS ALREADY PROPERLY CHARGED.

Certain other items have been pointed out by Messrs. Haskins & Sells, with the comment that although they may not be proper matters for adjustment, yet they should at least be interesting in connection with future legislation dealing with District fiscal relations.

In the opinion of your committee, all of the following have been properly charged and it is recommended that in all of such cases no sums shall be considered as being due, either legally or morally, from the one government to the other.

1. The first one is summarized by the committee's accountants in a letter to the chairman dated January 17, 1923:

In our opinion, the general fund should be charged with $545,484.54, as follows:

Redemption of District 5 per cent bonds issued under the act of Congress approved June 10, 1879 (exclusive of participation in interest payments and premiums paid on redemption), charged against the United States in violation of provisions of the act of Congress, as shown on page 33 of our report (50 per cent of $1,092,300)-----	$546, 150. 00
Less adjustment of errors, as enumerated on page 9 of our report-----	665, 46
Remainder-----	545, 484. 54

The act in question authorized the District commissioners to issue certain bonds of the District, redeemable 20 years after date, to an amount not exceeding $1,200,000. The committee's accountants base their contention on a provision contained in the act to the effect that it should not be construed to make the Federal Government liable for any part of the principal or interest on the bonds, and they point out that such payments were eventually made jointly from the revenues of the United States and of the District.

However, such reimbursement was made on the 50-50 basis, in accordance with the express authorization of the Congress, contained in several subsequent acts. In the opinion of this committee, Congress had knowledge, actual as well as constructive, of the provision contained in the act of June 10, 1879, and deliberately intended to place payment of the principal and interest of these bonds on the same basis as other District expenditures. Such is the view expressed by the District auditor and the Citizens' Joint Committee, while Mr. Taggart, of the General Accounting Office, does not give his opinion, because he believes the question is one of legal interpretation. Mr. Galloway, representing the Department of Justice, reiterates that in subsequent appropriation acts it is expressly recited that so much money be appropriated, 50 per cent from the revenues of the District and 50 per cent from the moneys of the United States, "for the payment of interest and sinking fund of the District." He adds that Congress certainly had a right to do this, and even though the provisions of former acts were in conflict with such appropriations the subsequent action of Congress must be held to control, the question being now legally settled. This position is supported by decisions of the Comptroller of the United States Treasury.

Your committee inclines strongly to this view and believes it worthy of note that the Mayes-Spalding investigations brought this matter fully to the attention of the Congress, which failed to include the item in those for which reimbursement was then required from the District.

2. The next principal item to which the committee's accountants invite consideration also dates back to the time when the present form of government was established in the District of Columbia by organic act of Congress. The United States then assumed 50 per cent of the debt of the District outstanding on June 30, 1878. There were, however, uncollected taxes amounting to $1,622,739.75, which were later deposited in the United States Treasury solely to the credit of the District. The question arises whether such action was proper, or whether the Federal Government should have been credited with 50 per cent of such tax collections.

Here, again, in the opinion of your committee, the law controls, reflecting as it does the evident intention of the Congress. The purpose of the organic act was to wipe the slate clean; to provide for the payment of prior and future obligations on a 50-50 basis; and to turn over to the District authorities what assets existed at the time. Messrs. Galloway, Donovan, and the citizens' joint committee are in accord with this view, while Mr. Taggart takes a neutral position.

The following extract from the Galloway report states the situation clearly:

"The organic act of June 11, 1878, provides that the Commissioners of the District shall have power to apply the taxes and other revenues of the District to the payment of the expenses thereof, and that they shall take over the books, papers, records, money, credit, securities, assets, and accounts belonging or appertaining to the business or interests of the District, and another part of the same act provides that all taxes shall be paid in the Treasury of the United States, and the same as well as the appropriations to be made by Congress, shall be disposed for the expenses of said District on itemized vouchers, etc. In other words, it seems that there was an intention to change the forms of Government, giving to the new form whatever assets that had accrued or were in the process of accruing for the purpose of beginning and carrying on the new plan. Even actual money then on deposit was transferred, to be used in accordance with the new plan, and it certainly was not the intention of Congress to deprive the District of all means during the first year of carrying out its duties under this new plan. Had these taxes, uncollected at June 30, 1878, been used for other purposes than the purposes of the new form of government, the District would have been unable to contribute one cent toward carrying out its part of said plan until it was able to assess and levy a new tax. Certainly Congress did not intend that by this legislation, and, in fact, the express provisions of the statute above referred to indicate a contrary intent; so that it is my opinion that from a legal standpoint this question is also settled, as Congress clearly showed that it intended that these uncollected taxes be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the District exactly as they were deposited."

The above is another item which was called to the attention of the Congress in the Mayes-Spalding investigations.

3. The largest item to which the accountants refer, without making definite recommendation, consists of receipts from licenses, privileges, etc., totaling $6,300,058.57 for the fiscal years 1912 to 1922, inclusive. These, in the opinion of your committee, fall clearly in the same category as local taxes, and were properly collected and deposited wholly to the credit of the District of Columbia. The organic act is specific on that point. After the requirement that annual estimates of proposed District expenditures should be transmitted to Congress, it provides that:

"To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates, Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof, and the remaining 50 per cent of such approved estimates shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and the District of Columbia."

District Auditor Donovan, in his report, cites several decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury which refer to this language and appear to settle the question conclusively in the District's favor. The arguments advanced under this head in the brief of the citizens' joint committee also appeal to your committee as being sound and based upon correct rules of legal construction.

It is, of course, quite within the province of the Congress to provide for a different disposal of future collections, and from time to time the receipts from certain privileges have been placed, by act of law, jointly to the credit of the District and the Federal Government. But except in cases where such specific provision is made the District has been entitled, according to your committee, to the full amount of such receipts.

Mr. Galloway, in his report, confirms this view that legally such fees and licenses should be credited wholly to the District, as has been done. Mr. Taggart "can see no reason why the District should now be charged with any part of these collections," with the exception of a small item known as special reimbursable taxes, amounting, during the period covered by the accountants' report, to $9,014.23. It is admitted that according to the law these latter items should be collected in the same manner as general taxes in the District of Columbia, and the committee can not see how a valid distinction can be made as to this class of miscellaneous collections.

4. Another matter referred to by the accountants, without any specific recommendation, arises from the fact that certain United States Army officers have been assigned from time to time to duty in the District Government. Their compensation, consisting of pay and allowances, comes wholly out of the revenues of the United States. This is also true of civil employees of the General Accounting Office who have been called upon to work on District accounts. The full amount of such Army officers' compensation between the years 1912 and 1922 is given as $282,422.18.

There is no question but that there is specific legislative authority for the payment of such Army officers by the United States and for their detail to the District government; neither is there any doubt as to the existence of statutes creating the positions held by employees in the General Accounting Office and the Treasury Department who keep the District accounts. These employees, of course, are selected primarily to safeguard the interests of the Federal Government.

More than this, the arrangement relating to Army officers carries out the general policy of the Congress. As pointed out by Mr. Taggart, who declines to make a recommendation, it has not been the policy to charge for the services of such engineer officers for river and harbor improvements, and for other purposes, even where the whole cost of the work is paid by States, municipalities, or by private interests.

Mr. Galloway, Mr. Donovan, and the citizens' joint committee concur in the views of your committee, that no part of this item should be properly charged to the District.

5. An item, to which the accountants have also called attention, is that certain collections made by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District for the issuance of certain licenses and for fines assessed against jurors are covered into the Treasury wholly to the credit of the Federal Government. The accountants recommend that the committee consider the item, while Mr. Taggart suggests an apportionment between the United States and the District as to such collections subsequent to June 30, 1922, which the committee understand is covered under the terms of the District appropriation act for the present fiscal year.

There is no question but that there was sufficient authority of law to justify the deposit of these funds wholly to the credit of the United States, and your committee believes it consistent to recommend that they should not be disturbed. A ruling in support of this position was made by the Comptroller of the Treasury under date of December 13, 1920. The entire sum involved is $175,870.99.

6. The cost of erecting and furnishing the District of Columbia Court of Appeals Building, provided for by the Act of May 30, 1908, aggregated $263,600, all of which was paid by the Federal Government. Salaries of employees and miscellaneous expenses of this building since its completion have been apportioned between the United States and the District of Columbia.

Your committee's attention has been called to the fact that in addition to considering appeals from the Supreme Court of the District, this appellate court also has original jurisdiction in cases involving patents, and that this business is of considerable volume. Many suits are also brought in or carried to this court on account of the fact that one of the parties is an official of the United States Government. Neither of these classes of cases can be properly considered as District matters.

In view of the various phases of this question which have been presented, your committee does not feel justified in recommending that the matter of the cost of erecting this Court of Appeals Building should be reopened.

This item, as well as those which follow, has been brought to the attention of your committee in the conduct of its hearings, but was not commented upon in the various reports heretofore referred to.

7. The annual report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the year 1896 (p. 96) refers to a judgment of $65,740.47 secured in the old case of the District v. The Metropolitan Railway Co. for paving done in the years 1871 to 1875. The entire amount was paid to the collector of taxes of the District, and the case closed.

It will be observed that the greater portion of this transaction arose prior to 1874 and that the work was all done some time before 1878. Under the head of item No. 2 of this title your committee takes the position that all of these assets prior to 1878, even if uncollected, were to go to the District under the provisions of the organic act. This case apparently falls in that category.

8. Section 7 of the act of May 18, 1916, provides for an appropriation of $25,000 for the repair and maintenance of the old Aqueduct Bridge until the bridge provided for in this same act should be completed. This money for such repair and maintenance was appropriated solely out of Federal funds.

In the preceding six sections of the chapter detailed reference is made to the erection of the new bridge, and what was appropriated in these sections was to be appropriated on the 50-50 basis. The amount appropriated to begin construction was $25,000 and the amount authorized $1,000,000.

It seems evident to your committee that the Congress clearly intended that the amount of $25,000 for repair and maintenance was to be paid by the United States.

9. The reclamation of that portion of Potomac Park on which the speedway has been built has also been brought to the attention of your committee. This reclamation project extended over a period of years, and was, of course, directly under the control of War Department engineers. It was paid for by the Federal Government, although the District shared proportionately in the building and maintenance of the improvements constructed thereon, such as the Speedway itself.

Concerning the primary purpose or original object of this reclamation project there may be some question. One leading reason which has been assigned is the improvement of navigation in the Potomac River, while sanitation may also have had something to do with the matter. After consideration of the facts as disclosed your committee does not believe that it was the intention to call upon the District to share in this expense or that any proportion of same should be charged at this time. However, it was deemed proper to make reference to the matter in this report for the information of the Congress.

TITLE V.—MORAL LIABILITY AND INTEREST.

In making its findings and recommendations, moral as well as legal obligations have been taken into consideration by the committee pursuant to the instructions of the act of June 29, 1922. The question of moral obligations has given its members some concern, as the language may conceivably be construed to cover an extremely wide field. In this, as in other matters, the scope of the committee's authority and duty is so broad under the terms of the act that its members felt impelled to submit the question to its legal adviser and the representative of the United States, Mr. Galloway, who rendered an opinion, which is here quoted in part:

"It happens that in this investigation practically all of the questions upon which it is contended a moral obligation should be predicated, as shown either by the report of your accountants or as suggested to your committee from other sources, are matters upon which Congress has by specific legislation provided or plainly pointed out the manner in which they intended that the certain expenditures therein provided for should be paid. This would seem to settle the question from a legal standpoint, even though there was prior legislation indicating a contrary intent upon the part of Congress, because the familiar rule is that the last legislation must control. Therefore the moral question involved would amount to little else than a determination by your committee as to whether or not Congress acted wisely when it enacted the specific legislation which is in question. In considering this question it is my opinion that you should closely question all suggestions that Congress in enacting certain legislation overlooked any facts or legislation upon the same subject and that you should not rely upon such suggestions until they are conclusively proven to you, but, on the contrary, you should indulge to a great extent in the presumption that Congress acted wisely with all of the facts before it, and after giving all of them due consideration and weight, and especially that Congress acted with a full knowledge of all prior legislation. While, of course, these considerations would not affect the right or wrong of the question in its inception, certainly they should have some bearing upon the equities of the question as it now exists, in view of the fact that the legislative body has once passed upon such question and that both of the parties to the controversy have long continued their activities in their reliance upon the settlement as therein provided.

"The application of the above rules would seem to remove from your consideration practically all of the moral questions except those wherein rather flagrant injustices appear to exist, and upon such questions as those it is my opinion that it is your duty to report to Congress with recommendations."

Your committee has had in mind the above opinion, to which it is bound to give most serious consideration, and believes that it contains a proper application of general principles to the particular case in hand.

There remains the question of interest. The language of the act of June 29, 1922, is quite specific, and reads:

"And in event any money may be, or at any time has been, by Congress or otherwise, found due, either legally or morally, from the one to the other, on account of loans, advancements, or improvements made, upon which interest has not been paid by either to the other, then such sums as have been or may be found due from one to the other shall be considered as bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the time when the principal should, either legally or morally, have been paid until actually paid."

Thus it is made a part of the duty of this committee to calculate interest at 3 per cent per annum on the sums concerning which readjustment is recommended in Title III of this report, and to report the amount thereof to the Congress. This has been done, and a detailed statement of such interest calculations may be found in part 2 of this report. It is assumed that interest should be figured on annual and not daily balances, as the latter would be a practically impossible task.

It is also the duty of your committee under the act to calculate interest at the same rate on any sums which have heretofore been found due by the Congress at any time since 1874 from one government to the other. As set forth under Title II of this report, all such sums on which a settlement has been made, with or without payment of interest, consist of reimbursements by the District to the Federal Government.

Items are expressly excluded, by the language of the act, on which interest has already been paid, irrespective of the rate. Such an item would be the one for moneys advanced by the United States to the District for extraordinary improvements between 1902 and 1910. In this case, as hereinbefore set forth, the Congress not only required the payment of the principal, $4,144,696.35, but also interest at 2 per cent, which amounted to $586,702.83.

Between the years 1910 and 1920 the United States was apparently quite active in securing reimbursement from the District on account of advances made by the Federal Government, or for other reasons. In addition to the above item of $4,144,696.35 and interest, at least 14 distinct items were collected, their total being $2,814,947.76. On most of this amount interest was never paid, and it is now proposed that such obligations, long since settled, shall be resurrected for the purpose of calculating and charging interest. This, at any rate, was the contention of Congressman JOHNSON of Kentucky before your committee, and the language of the act would appear to bear out that construction. Your committee had no alternative but to prepare such tables, and has acted accordingly.

It will be observed that three of the items in question, enumerated in part 2 of this report, in the principal sum of $125,865, on which it is now advocated by some that interest be collected, date prior to 1878, being for general expenses and the construction and maintenance of schools; while the majority of the others run through a period of years but have their inception prior to 1880.

Attention is also called to the fact that in the case of "reimbursement account of Washington Market Co. rentals, 1878 to 1914, $158,437.50," the act in question, that of March 4, 1915, contained the expression "such sum being in full settlement of the amount due the United States for said market rentals."

Two other items should be noted, both headed, "Reimbursement account of support of insane in St. Elizabeths Hospital," and being for $719,536.07 and $282,754.26, respectively. In the case of the latter item, the language of the act is as follows: "To further reimburse the United States and in full." More than this, the accountant calculated interest and included it in his report; yet no interest was charged. What could be clearer than this to show that the Federal Government deliberately intended to waive and did waive any claim to interest?

This entire statement, as well as the others appearing in part 2 of this report, should be carefully examined by Members of the Congress.

While the Congress has, of course, extensive powers with relation to the District of Columbia, it is our firm conviction that the collection of interest on these paid-up accounts, particularly when it is specified that settlement is "in full" or "in full settlement" can not be supported, either on legal or equitable principles. In this connection the views of Mr. E. F. Colladay, of the citizens' joint committee, as expressed in the hearings, are quoted below:

"I would like to present just a few words by way of quotation from volume 15 of Ruling Case Law, which I believe is the best compendium of American law extant. I read from page 13, on the subject of interest as incident to or separable from the principal debt. (Reading:)

"The right to recover interest after the payment of the principal sum due, depends upon whether the interest is due by the terms of the contract, or whether it is merely implied and allowed by way of damages in an action for the principal.

"If interest is due by the terms of the contract, the payment of the principal is no bar to its subsequent recovery; but if it is not due by the terms of the contract, the payment of the principal sum is a bar to recovery.

"The reason for the rule is that interest being a mere incident to the debt, can not exist without it, and the debt being extinguished, the interest must necessarily be extinguished also."

"The relation between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government is such that the District of Columbia can only act as Congress acts for it, in the matter of payments or demands. Congress has acted in the matter of requiring the District of Columbia to pay back certain items. In one instance Congress requires 2 per cent interest on an item, and the interest was paid, with the item.

"In other instances Congress required the payment of principal without requiring the payment of interest. There was no contract obligation nor statute obligation to take the place of the contract obligation, prescribing interest. There was no interest separate and distinct from the principal obligation."

Your committee recommends that in all such cases where the Congress has acted and enforced collections of the principal sum such action should be treated as final and no interest whatever be charged at this time.

As to the other matters concerning which adjustment is recommended in this report, your committee takes the same view, though for different reasons. The argument has been made, with much force, that if the United States has on hand money belonging to the District it should be considered a demand deposit, which would not be due until demand is requested in accordance with the law. Legally, therefore, interest could not be charged prior to such demand. Taking this view of the matter it would, of course, be inequitable to make interest charges against the District government, if interest was not collected when the balance was in the District's favor.

Furthermore, if equitable principles be held to apply, the doctrine of dilatory creditor could certainly be urged against the United States in any attempt to collect interest from the District of Columbia, even though time limitations may not run against the Federal Government.

Legal and equitable consideration, so far as they may be held to apply to the peculiar relationship existing between these two governments, cause this committee to recommend that, in making any settlement upon the basis of facts disclosed in this report, no interest should be held to be due from the one government to the other.

TITLE VI.—CONCLUSION.

Before concluding part 1 of its report, your committee wishes to call attention to part 2 thereof. This contains, as required under the provisions of the act by which the committee was created, a statement of the sums which have been expended by the United States and the District of Columbia, respectively, from July 1, 1874, to June 30, 1922, inclusive, for the purposes enumerated, as ascertained through the authorized inquiry into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the two governments. In our opinion, the statement in question shows clearly, for the purposes required, the relative participation or contributions by the United States and the District.

Part 2 also contains the interest tables called for by the act of June 29, 1922. Among other valuable matters can be found in part 2 a statement of estimates submitted by the District Commissioners for the past 10 fiscal years, together with the amounts actually allocated in the annual District appropriation bills. It will be noted that the estimates total $172,117,932.63, and the appropriations $147,089,156.08. One-half of the difference of $25,028,776.55 (or $12,514,388.27) may be contrasted with the total amount of the free surplus now under consideration, namely, $4,671,196.97.

It is believed that from the foregoing statements made by your committee a clear understanding of the situation, as revealed by its investigation, may be secured, and confirmation of same may be found in the documents which have been ordered to be printed. Among these documents are: The reports of Messrs. Haskins and Sells, containing tabulations; of Messrs. Galloway, Taggart, Donovan, Hodgson, and the citizens' joint committee; also your committee's hearings and other papers.

To summarize: Your committee recommends that the Senate and House of Representatives recognize the existence of a free surplus in the United States Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, as of June 30, 1922, in the—

Sum of.....	$4,671,196.97
That there shall also be credited the sum of.....	665.46

(To correct certain errors in stating the account between the two governments).....	4,671,862.43
-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	--------------

That from these amounts should be deducted the following:

The District's proportion of the $240 bonus paid to its employees.....	191,890.35
The District's proportion of cost of additional land for the National Zoological Park.....	41,500.00
One-half of amount appropriated by special act for relief of Eldred C. Davis.....	317.16
	<hr/> 233,707.51

And that the net balance of.....	4,438,154.92

shall be held to be in the Treasury of the United States, subject to appropriation by the Congress, as a part of the District's share of the expenses of maintaining its government, in accordance with the law.

In connection with the items on which reimbursement has already been required by the Federal Government, and the items on which adjustment is recommended in this report, your committee recommends that no interest charges shall be made, either against the District of Columbia or the United States.

Your committee reports that the investigations which have been made into fiscal relations between the two governments are as full and complete, for all practical purposes, as can ever be secured, and recommends action by the present Congress that will definitely and finally set at rest existing contentions and conflicts between the District and Federal Governments.

From an accounting and bookkeeping standpoint, and giving due consideration and weight to the organic law of 1878, as well as other laws passed by Congress from time to time, and the rulings of the Comptroller of the Treasury, we believe this report to all practical purposes reflects the fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia, and shows the surplus to the credit of the District in the Treasury of the United States. Some members of the committee believe that these laws, although binding, were in many instances more favorable to the District than they should have been, if due consideration had been given to the taxpayers of the United States, and that under these laws the United States has for a long time and is now contributing more than its just proportion to the administration of the District government and the upkeep of the District; and that this is especially true when consideration is given to the limited activities and interests of the United States in the District, which are not wholly maintained at the expense of the United States, as compared to the large, expansive, and growing interests of the residents of the District or those owning property therein, and taking into consideration also the low tax rate paid on property located in the District.

Respectfully submitted.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 120, line 4, after the word "practicable," to insert: "and the purchase of artificial limbs or other appliances for indigent persons who were injured in the service of the Isthmian Canal Commission or the Panama Canal prior to September 7, 1916," and in line 11, to strike out "$550,000" and insert "$584,422.28," so as to read:

For sanitation, quarantine, hospitals, and medical aid and support of the insane and of lepers and aid and support of indigent persons legally within the Canal Zone, including expenses of their deportation when practicable, and the purchase of artificial limbs or other appliances for indigent persons who were injured in the service of the Isthmian Canal Commission or the Panama Canal prior to September 7, 1916, and including additional compensation to any officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed with the Panama Canal as chief quarantine officer, $584,422.28.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, at the end of line 15, to strike out "$930,000" and insert "$1,006,200," so as to read:

For civil government of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone; district judge, $7,500; district attorney, $5,000; marshal, $5,000; and for gratuities and necessary clothing for indigent discharged prisoners, $1,006,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 16, to increase the total appropriation for the Panama Canal from "$6,559,683" to "$6,670,305.28."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 121, line 14, before the numeral "1922," to strike out "July 1" and insert "June 30," so as to read:

Except in cases of emergency or conditions arising subsequent to and unforeseen at the time of submitting the annual estimates to Congress, and except for those employed in connection with the construction of permanent quarters, offices, and other necessary buildings, dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and appurtenances for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies, there shall not be employed at any time during the fiscal year 1924, under any of the foregoing appropriations for the Panama Canal, any greater number of persons than are specified in the notes submitted, respectively, in connection with the estimates for each of said appropriations in the Budget for said year, nor shall there be paid to any such person during that fiscal year any greater rate of compensation than was authorized to be paid to persons occupying the same or like positions on June 30, 1922; and all employments made or compensation increased because of emergencies or conditions so arising shall be specifically set forth, with the reasons therefor, by the governor in his report for the fiscal year 1924.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On behalf of the committee I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Chair is advised that one amendment of the committee, on page 21, lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, was passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] desires that amendment to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] requested before that it go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Utah spoke to me about it a moment ago. Will the Senator from New York let that go over with the other amendment until to-morrow?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am willing that the amendment at the bottom of page 21 shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that the Harbord amendment, so called?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New York has agreed that it shall go over until to-morrow. The Senator from Utah asked me a little while ago to ask that it go over if it came up this afternoon. I have no objection to considering it now, so far as I am personally concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment at the bottom of page 21 will be passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In behalf of the committee I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 10, line 18, after the numeral "$275,000," insert the following:

Provided, That the mileage allowance to members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when called into active service for training for 15 days or less shall not exceed 4 cents per mile: Provided further, That the laws providing for land-grant deductions shall not apply to travel at 4 cents per mile heretofore performed by members of the Officers' Reserve Corps under the War Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, approved June 30, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On behalf of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 35, after line 23, it is proposed to insert the following:

Hereafter the cost of transportation of civilian employees and of material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Signal Corps, Air Service, Medical Department, Engineer Department, and the Coast Artillery Corps, and in connection with the construction and installation of fire-control projects at seacoast fortifications by the Coast Artillery Corps may be charged to the appropriations for the work in connection with which such transportation charges are required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator explain the amendment which has just been read? The amendment was read so rapidly that I did not fully understand it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under present law when the War Department purchases anything, either by direct purchase or by contract, the cost of transporting the finished article from the factory door to the place where the Government wishes to use it is charged against the appropriation for transportation of the Army. There is no authority for the charges of that freight bill to the cost of the article. The result is that the transportation appropriations are tremendously overburdened with such charges in the nature of freight bills on finished articles which are to be delivered at the place where the War Department or the Army wishes to use them. The Government loses a great deal of money by it.

For example, in the Air Service the only way in which the Chief of the Air Service has been able to have the freight bills paid on newly made airplanes is to invite the bidders who are seeking the contract to include in their bids the transportation cost from the factory door to the flying field, which may be 2,000 miles distant.

The Chief of the Air Service can not receive a sufficient allotment under the transportation appropriation to pay for the cost of transporting those airplanes by railroad. If he is given authority to charge that cost against the appropriation for the purchase of the planes, then, if he wishes, he can transport the plane from the factory door to the flying field over a land-grant railroad and receive the benefit of the reduced freight rates which are allowed to the Government. It is perfectly obvious that the amendment, if adopted, would save money.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's explanation is entirely satisfactory to me, and I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire are the amendments now being offered by the Senator from New York offered on behalf of the committee, or are they individual amendments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. These are amendments which the committee have authorized the chairman of the committee to offer.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the Senator from New York himself had certain amendments which he proposed to offer which were printed, and I did not know whether or not the amendments which he is now offering were those amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have had most of the amendments printed for the information of the Senate. The amendment which I now offer, I will say to the Senator from Florida, has not been printed, but I can remind the Senator from Florida about the amendment as soon as it shall have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 52, after line 18, it is proposed to insert the following:

The sum of $400,000 of the appropriation for the Air Service for the fiscal year 1921 contained in the "act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, shall remain available until June 30, 1924, for the payment of obligations incurred under contracts executed prior to June 30, 1921.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amendment does not provide a new appropriation, but is merely to continue available an appropriation made two years ago, in order that the final payments on contracts for the building of airplanes, and which are almost finished, may be made this spring. If the former appropriation is not made available, it means that the War Department will not be able to pay the money which it owes to the contractors for the finished planes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer another amendment on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 52, in line 4, after the numeral "$3,500," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the present incumbent, upon the completion of his service, shall be entitled to be placed upon the retired list of the United States Army (with the rank of lieutenant colonel) under the same conditions as are prescribed by law for other officers of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does that amendment refer to the master of the sword at the Military Academy?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does.

Mr. McKELLAR. He has been there a long time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He has been there for 40 years.

Mr. McKELLAR. And he should have this recognition, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On behalf of the committee I offer another amendment, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 95, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following new paragraph:

That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BROOKHART. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The READING CLERK. After the word "work," at the end of line 9, it is proposed to insert:

nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered to the amendment of the Senator from New York makes the same provision in the pending bill as that in the naval appropriation bill, which we have already passed. I believe also that the same words have been carried in former Army appropriation bills for a number of years.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have been carried in such bills for many years.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in the House of Representatives the provision relating to the so-called stop-watch method of factory management and relating to the payment of bonuses to workmen in Government arsenals and War Department arsenals was stricken out, as I recollect, on a point of order. The language, as the Senator from Iowa has stated, has been contained in Army appropriation bills for some time past.

The Committee on Appropriations reports to the Senate the provision prohibiting the use of the so-called stop-watch method but does not report to the Senate an amendment which would prohibit the payment of a bonus to an especially efficient workman. We do not believe that it is wise to install the so-called stop-watch or Taylor efficiency system in the arsenals; we join with those who want to have that prohibited by statute; but at the same time we do not believe that the Government should be denied by statute the right to give additional compensation to a workman for especially efficient work. That being the attitude of the committee, I can not, of course, accept on behalf of the committee the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and I honestly believe that the amendment as proposed by the committee actually covers all conditions in the manufacturing plants of the War Department of which so many of the workmen are suspicious and to which they are antagonistic. I do not believe that the workmen of our arsenals have any real objection to the Government paying a little extra compensation now and then to their fellows who are especially efficient. So I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York on behalf of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the amendment to the amendment proposes to incorporate in the bill a provision which has been in various Navy and Army appropriation bills for many years. It is a provision upon which the workmen lay great stress. It has been found to be appropriate heretofore, and I see no reason for changing the law. Therefore, Mr. President, if the Senate is ready to vote on the amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator be satisfied with a division?

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I will be satisfied with a division.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word in explanation of my vote. I have voted heretofore to prohibit the stop-watch method and in favor of the bonus provision because I thought that there was simply involved in the latter case the payment of the ordinary bonus. I have made some further investigation, however, during the last week with reference to the matter. I have looked into it more carefully than I ever did before, and I am satisfied that it is not the ordinary bonus at all which is involved, but that it goes much further than that. I think we ought to prohibit the payment of bonuses as well as the stop-watch method, and so I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the amendment to the amendment does not have in view the ordinary bonus payment at all, but that character of bonus which has behind it the idea of forcing or driving men to higher speed and a more rapid method of working, just as is involved in the case of the stop-watch method. There is no objection to a bonus in a general way being paid to everybody, so far as that is concerned; but it is a feature of the older efficiency scheme that we are trying to prohibit, as I understand. I think we had better have a roll call on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division has been called for.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well; let us have a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York on behalf of the committee.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 108, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Notwithstanding the restrictive provisions of the act of February 26, 1896 (29 Stats. p. 21), the Secretary of War is authorized in his discretion to permit, without cost to the United States, the erection of monuments or memorials to commemorate encampments of Spanish War organizations which were encamped in said park during the period of the Spanish-American War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I offer two amendments, not on behalf of the committee, because it so happens that the committee has had no opportunity to examine them. I am offering them as an individual Senator.

I send the first amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 19, after line 3, it is proposed to insert:

Section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved July 31, 1894, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows:

"Retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard shall not be construed to hold an office within the meaning of this section."

Payments heretofore made to retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard under appointments to civil offices with a compensation of $2,500 or more per annum are hereby validated.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator explain that amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the statute to which that amendment refers forbids the employment of certain personnel deemed to hold offices in the civil service of the United States at a wage higher than $2,500 a year. There are about 12 retired Regular Army enlisted men now employed in places drawing more than $2,500 a year. To the great astonishment of everybody the comptroller or somebody has ruled that a retired enlisted man of the Regular Army holds an office as such. The result of the ruling is that these 12 old soldiers are now called upon to pay back into the Federal Treasury the amount of money in excess of $2,500 that they have been drawing.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's amendment is entirely right. It ought to be adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Military Affairs Committee has examined into this matter and has reported favorably a bill for this purpose. The construction given to the word "officer" was so astounding in this case that the Military Affairs Committee is unanimous in its support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I send to the desk one more amendment of a legislative character which will take just a moment to explain, and then I think I shall have finished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 20, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

Nothing contained in any existing laws or regulations or orders promulgated in pursuance of law shall be construed to authorize on or after July 1, 1922, the issue of heat or light in kind to any person in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service, while such person is receiving an allowance for rental of quarters under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved June 10, 1922.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, under the new pay law passed last year the allowances known as heat and light were abolished, and in their place was substituted one allowance, known as the rental allowance. The rental allowance is paid to officers of the six services when they are not occupying public quarters. It is to cover their house rent if they have to rent houses, and their heat, and their light. We understand on very reliable authority that there are certain accounting or auditing officers who are expressing the opinion, or are about to express the opinion, that in certain cases officers may draw not only the rental allowance but also the old allowance of heat and light in kind. We do not want that duplication.

Mr. McKELLAR. Nor do I; so I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The intent of the Congress was to have the rental allowance cover all the old allowances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that completes the bill, as far as the committee is concerned, with one exception.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to submit a request for unanimous consent touching a vote to be had on a provision in this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, after consultation with a number of Senators whom I know to be interested in the matter, including the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I ask unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes on to-morrow the Senate proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to the rivers and harbors item; and I will state my reason for making that request.

A number of Senators—five Senators—desire to leave on the 3.15 train to go to the city of Savannah, including the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], who is the author of the concurrent resolution that passed the Senate to-day; that is, assuming that his resolution passes the body at the other end of the Capitol. I have consulted with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and they have indicated their acquiescence in this unanimous-consent suggestion. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is now conferring by telephone with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I shall object to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Utah makes it unnecessary to pursue the matter further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had hoped that we might get an agreement to vote on the river and harbor item. I was about to welcome with a good deal of cheerfulness the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was not in the Chamber when I first made the suggestion, or I should have consulted him about the matter. I hope he may see fit now to withdraw his objection, in view of the conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I can not withdraw it at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I say—perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber—that the committee amendments now are finished, with one exception. We are to recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. We shall have between 11 and 2.45 o'clock, if the Senator's suggestion is adopted, to do nothing but debate the river and harbor item.

Mr. ROBINSON. That will afford practically three hours' debate on the item.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator think that is sufficient?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suppose nothing remains but to say that perhaps in the morning the request may be renewed if the Senator from Utah thinks over the matter and concludes to consent to the arrangement I have stated. The train leaves at 3.15 o'clock, and in the event the concurrent resolution passes the House that will be the latest hour at which the committee can leave here to arrive in Savannah in time to attend the exercises which it is expected will be held there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this completes the consideration of the committee amendments with the exception of one which has been put over until to-morrow, that one being found at the foot of page 21. I am not entirely certain what the pleasure of the Senate is at this time. Before the order for the recess is invoked I expect to move an executive session. I do not now move it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desired to address myself to the failure of the Senate to do anything touching the codification of the laws—a matter which has been before Congress for some time, and which passed the House some time ago, but apparently nothing has been done in the Senate. There are only a few days remaining, and if failure comes about all of the work that has been done in the House will go for naught.

I do not see the chairman of the committee having the matter in charge, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. EANSER]. If he is in the Chamber in the morning I shall bring up this matter, so that we may know whether something is to be done, or whether the bill will die in the Senate, as it has heretofore.

I shall not say anything further at this time, because the chairman of the committee is not in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator have reference to the revision of the laws?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly hope that some action will be taken on it before the close of this Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I knew the Senator felt that way about it. A great many Senators feel that way about it, but I do not care to discuss it in the absence of the chairman of the committee having the matter in charge.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, are individual amendments to the bill now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask for the consideration of the amendment which I send to the desk and which has been printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In the proper place it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter the engineer officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall, during the term of his office, have the rank, pay, and allowance of a brigadier general.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say, in regard to that amendment, that the present occupant of that office is Col. Clarence O. Sherrill. The amendment meets with the approval of the War Department and the Chief of Staff. In addition to his duties as the officer in charge of public buildings, which are quite important enough to warrant the title of brigadier general, there is this further situation: He is also, by virtue of his office, aid to the President. The corresponding aid from the Navy is an admiral, and at public functions and in meeting with representatives of other governments there is a certain embarrassment in having the Army represented by a colonel and the Navy represented by an admiral. The cost is practically nothing. If the man in charge is 30 years in service, there is no difference in cost between the rank of colonel and the rank of brigadier general in this office. The average service of 27 years would make a difference in cost of $200 a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the amendment by any extra effort. I shall not favor it. I expect to vote against it. There is nothing personal at all in my attitude, because I have no doubt Colonel Sherrill is a most efficient officer and deserving of every consideration. I think, however, that it is a mistake to proceed here to increase his rank to that of brigadier general simply because at social functions he is the aid to the President. I think he can perform the duties of aid to the President just as well as a colonel as he could as a brigadier general, and I can not see any real justification for this advance in rank to brigadier general simply for social reasons.

I can not support the amendment, although, as I say, I am not going to make any particular effort against it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I want to say is this: There is no question but that Colonel Sherrill does as much work, and perhaps more work, than an admiral of the Navy. I know of no officer of the Government who does more work than Colonel Sherrill. He is a splendid officer. He has good judgment. I would like to have him taken care of in some other way; but if this is the only way he can be taken care of, I have no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is fair to say this is not really a raise in pay.

Mr. SMOOT. It is, of $200.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just $200. It is not for that purpose that the Senator from Missouri offers the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted it is not for that purpose. I shall not object, if it is thought the proper thing to do.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that there be placed in the RECORD a list of the duties of the Engineer commissioner of the United States Army, assigned as officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, for information.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DUTIES OF THE ENGINEER OFFICER, UNITED STATES ARMY, ASSIGNED AS OFFICER IN CHARGE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

1. Military aid to the President and his personal escort on formal official functions; in charge of arrangements for all diplomatic, social, and military functions at the White House; represents the President in formal courtesies to diplomatic and other foreign officials.

2. In charge of the improvement, maintenance, and operation of the parks of Washington, including the administration of all activities therein, such as recreational features—bathing beach, golf courses, tennis courts, baseball fields, and so on. This work involves an expenditure of approximately $1,000,000 a year.

3. In charge of the maintenance and operation of the public memorials, such as the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument.

4. In charge of the maintenance and upkeep of the White House, the executive offices, and the White House grounds, including the disbursement of funds for the White House police force.

5. Executive officer and in charge of the construction and administration of the details of business for the following commissions:

Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission.

Lincoln Memorial Commission.

Grant Memorial Commission.

The Meade Memorial Commission.

The Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission.

The Ericsson Memorial Commission.

6. A member of the Public Buildings Commission, which is charged with the duty of assignment of all office space to the departments and establishments in Washington. This commission has during the past year by detailed study committed to the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds saved over $100,000 in rentals.

7. A member of the Zoning Commission, which is charged with the administration of the laws prescribing the character of use, height, and area of occupancy of all buildings in Washington.

8. Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Buildings, which involves the operation, maintenance, repairs, and cleaning and general upkeep of 26 public office buildings with a floor space of approximately 6,000,000 square feet and involving the expenditure of approximately $2,000,000 a year. Congress recently added to this office's responsibilities the Interior Department Building, the Patent Office Building, the Land Office Building, and the Pension Office Building.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 18, after line 24, to insert the following:

Any officer whose name is now borne on the Army Register, and who served with credit as a general officer of the line during the World War, or who was recommended for appointment as a general officer of the line by the commander in chief, American Expeditionary Forces, prior to November 11, 1918, shall be eligible for selection to the general officers' eligible list provided for in the national defense act, approved June 4, 1920, notwithstanding the fact that he shall now hold a grade below that of colonel in the line.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the only purpose of this amendment is to make eligible for appointment as general officers those officers who, during the World War, actually served as general officers of the line, and also those who, because of conspicuous service, were then recommended for appointment as general officers. This does not increase the number in any way, and it does not accomplish the promotion of anybody, but merely makes them eligible if the President shall select them. I believe the committee has no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

ASSOCIATION OF PRODUCERS OF TURPENTINE AND ROSIN.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this morning when the calendar was being considered, the call was stopped just before we reached a bill in which I am very much interested, and which I hoped to have passed. The matter is one I offered in the form of an amendment to the Capper bill, I believe, to permit producers of rosin and turpentine to come under the provisions of the cooperative marketing bill, the same as the producers of nuts, the producers of cotton, and so forth. I presented the matter to the Senate at that time, and was told that I should try to have it passed in the form of a separate bill, so I withdrew the amendment for that reason.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry unanimously reported out the bill, and it is on the calendar. The only change it makes in the law is in allowing producers of rosin and turpentine to come under the provisions of that law. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4324, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of the first section of an act entitled "An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products," approved February 18, 1922, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products, as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, nut or fruit growers, or producers of turpentine and rosin may act together in association, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing, for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce, such products of persons so engaged. Such associations may have marketing agencies in common; and such associations and their members may make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect such purpose: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, as such producers, and conform to one or both of the following requirements."

Sec. 2. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know really why we should pass a bill affecting producers of turpentine and rosin.

Mr. HARRISON. When I offered this, it was to cover naval stores, rosin and turpentine being classed as naval stores, but the Senator from Massachusetts raised some objection to that term being employed, so I restricted it to rosin and turpentine. Rosin and turpentine, of course, as the Senator knows, are extracted from the yellow pine of the Gulf coast section, and the small farmers down there and the small producers for 17 years, with one exception, have had difficulty in getting any fair prices for their turpentine and rosin. I can not really see any harm in their being permitted to collectively market their products any more than there would be wrong in allowing the producers of nuts to collectively market. It will aid them very, very much in disposing of their crops. They call these articles "crops," and the trees "orchards," just the same as you get crops of peaches from peach trees. That is about all I can say. It changes the law in no other particular except the one I have mentioned.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that if the producers of rosin have the right provided for in this bill it ought to be extended to all industries. I do not see why the producers of rosin should have this privilege any more than the manufacturers of glue.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is really an agricultural product.

Mr. SMOOT. So is glue, made from the hoofs and hides of cattle. I do not see any difference at all between the two.

Mr. HARRISON. That might be a very good reason for including glue. I only know about this particular proposition. I know those products have always been carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill. They are considered agricultural matters. These crops are owned by small farmers. In thousands and thousands of instances, where they have, say, 40 trees, they will box them, and this is to allow them to organize and sell their product. There have been times in the past 10 years when they could not dispose of their rosin and turpentine at any price at all. They are just turned loose, and everyone takes care of himself. If the purposes of the other bill for the protection of those engaged in agricultural production were good, I can not see any harm, under the peculiar circumstances confronting these people, in passing this.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object, although I think it is going a long way outside of agriculture. I do not know where it will end.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is aware that rosin and naval stores have been taken care of under the Agricultural appropriation bills and have been considered as agricultural products.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that. We have had legislation in regard to them on every Agricultural appropriation bill, and special legislation at times, since I have been in the Senate, but just because they are handled in an agricultural bill does not appeal to me in any way as an argument why they should be treated any different from glue or other articles which may be made from farm products. That is the way it looks to me; but I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DRAINAGE SYSTEM, PIUTE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Piute Indians in Nevada have 4,047 acres of land, for which they have already secured water rights. Of this land 1,200 acres is water-logged and of no use unless it is drained. The State of Nevada under the Newlands Act has a drainage district which takes care of these 4,047 acres. All the land in the drainage district is now included in the project except these Indian lands.

House bill 10211, authorizing an appropriation to meet proportionate expenses of providing a drainage system for Piute Indian lands in the State of Nevada within the Newlands reclamation project of the Reclamation Service is on the calendar. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place these Indian lands within that drainage district. The cost of it, of course, is reimbursable. The Senate passed precisely the same bill a few weeks ago and it met with the approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be now considered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not intend to object to the consideration of this bill, and I really have no objection to it, but I do not think we should take up the calendar at this time in the evening. The main reason is that a good many Members of the Senate have gone. We usually transact business of this kind in the morning hour, and Senators are not apprised as to what is coming up when the calendar is brought up in the evening. I think it is very much better, if Senators are going to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of bills of this kind, that they should do it in the morning hour when those who may want to object or have an interest in them are here and have an opportunity to object, but that it should not be done late in the evening when many Senators think we are proceeding with the regular order and that such things as these are not to be brought up.

I do not like to object to bills which are not of personal interest, and I am not going to raise any objection to this; but I will ask for the regular order after this bill is considered. I hope that when this bill is disposed of we will go on with the regular order, and not take up any other bill at this hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $41,077.05, payable in 20 annual installments of $2,100 each, except the last, which shall be the amount remaining unpaid, for the purpose of meeting the proportionate expense of providing a drainage system for 4,047 acres of Piute Indian lands in the State of Nevada, within the Newlands project of the Reclamation Service.

The money herein authorized to be appropriated shall be reimbursed in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to said Indian lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 6, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 5, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Father in heaven, a power full of mercy and compassion belongeth unto Thee, and we are not afraid. In coming unto Thee there is an inspiring comfort. Speak graciously to all hearts and reveal unto us that which we are unable to understand. Keep us close to the people, lest we lose the touch of sympathy and thus fail to know their real needs. The Lord quicken the public conscience. Make all men to know that the chief glory of a nation lies in its high moral tone. Preserve us as a people from all sins that bring destructive self-reproach. Lift us up to that high moral plane that would cause heaven to smile to see a country so blest. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 3, 1923, was read and approved.

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE DIVISION.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago there was some discussion in the House relative to the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] made some remarks, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] took occasion to make some remarks on that subject. I ask leave to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a statement from the War Department defining the peace-time activities of the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department, and a letter from Secretary Weeks to Mr. W. G. Lee, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; and also a letter to Mr. Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it be agreeable to have this go in the back part of the RECORD?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. It ought to go there.

Mr. STAFFORD. The other day we had a dissertation on the dog and some other animals right in the body of the House proceedings. Let it go in the back part of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That is where it properly should go.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, what has that dissertation on the dog to do with the Secretary of War? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. This is a dissertation on men. It has no reflection on that brave young lieutenant out in the Northwest who is trying to do his duty, has it?

Mr. McKENZIE. As I understand it this is simply a statement of facts. I am not acquainted with the young officer. I do not know him at all. I do not know whether he is a brave man or acts wisely.

Mr. BLANTON. There are letters there from the Secretary of War to the brotherhood chiefs and to Mr. Gompers concerning this matter.

Mr. McKENZIE. The purpose is simply to put before the country the correct status.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection to general rules going to the country, but the gentleman will remember that, because a man tries to do his duty as the Attorney General did, some of these people try to get him into hot water.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that he may extend his remarks in the manner indicated, to be inserted in the back of the RECORD. There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following statement of the Secretary of War given to press on incident at Vancouver Barracks, Wash.:

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF WAR GIVEN TO PRESS ON INCIDENT AT VANCOUVER BARRACKS, WASH.

It having recently come to the attention of the Secretary of War that the unauthorized activities of subordinate officers have in a few isolated instances occasioned the possibility of a public misunderstanding of the proper function of military intelligence in time of peace, he has directed the publication of the following statement.

The surveillance of domestic organizations or groups is not at all the purpose of the Military Intelligence Division, the authorized activities of which are clearly set forth in Army Regulations, 10-15, as follows:

"The Military Intelligence Division is charged, in general, with those duties of the War Department General Staff which relate to the collection, evaluation, and dissemination of military information.

"The Military Intelligence Division is specifically charged with the preparation of plans and policies and the supervision of all activities concerning:

- "(1) Military topographical surveys and maps.
- "(2) The custody of the General Staff map and photograph collection.
- "(3) Military attachés, observers, and foreign-language students.
- "(4) Intelligence personnel of all units.
- "(5) Liaison with other intelligence agencies of the Government and with duly accredited foreign military attachés and missions.
- "(6) Codes and ciphers.
- "(7) Translations.
- "(8) Relations with the press.
- "(9) Censorship in time of war."

During the World War our widespread military interests necessitated special measures which resulted in authority being given for the Military Intelligence Division to conduct investigations of far-reaching character. During the period of demobilization and contraction of the Military Establishment to a normal peace-time basis, activities of this nature were transferred as rapidly as seemed practicable to the proper civil agencies.

Not only have the instructions which were in effect for the operation of the Military Intelligence Service during the war and shortly thereafter been rescinded but repeatedly since that time instructions have been issued emphasizing the fact that the military authorities are expressly prohibited from making investigations in time of peace other than within the Military Establishment.

"At certain posts and stations along the coasts and frontiers where information in connection with actual or theoretical plans of defense is required the necessity for intelligence officers is clear. It is also necessary to appoint the intelligence officers prescribed by the Tables of Organization and to employ them in training their personnel in combat intelligence. But it is no longer necessary to have intelligence officers at all posts and stations in the United States, as the conditions requiring their employment have long ceased to exist.

"With the foregoing in mind, a corps area commander will appreciate the necessity for giving his personal attention to seeing that his staff are correctly oriented as to intelligence work in general and as to its extremely limited application to domestic affairs. It is a case of not only revoking obsolete orders and instructions but of guiding such intelligence officers as are retained to a correct mental conception of the duties of military intelligence within the United States."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington.

Mr. W. G. LEE,
President Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen,
Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR MR. LEE: It has recently come to my attention that the intelligence officer at Vancouver Barracks, Wash., has sent out a circular letter to law-enforcement officials of local communities intimating that the Military Intelligence Division of the Army is interested in the railroad brotherhoods as elements potentially hostile to the purposes of this Government. This letter was printed on page 122 of The Nation, January 31, 1923.

The Military Intelligence Division conducts no investigations in time of peace of the nature indicated in this young officer's letter. I feel assured that you will agree with me that his assertions are so absurd that the War Department should not accord the dignity of a denial to the suggestion that organized labor is looked upon as a hostile organization. I have directed a thorough investigation of the matter and shall apply such corrective and disciplinary measures as may prove warranted.

I sincerely regret this incident and trust that you will look upon it only as the immature action of a young man whose enthusiasm has completely dwarfed his judgment.

Yours very truly,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 30, 1923.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President the American Federation of Labor,
901 Massachusetts Avenue N.W., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GOMPERS: It was recently brought to my attention that a young intelligence officer at Vancouver Barracks, Wash., had sent out a circular letter to law-enforcement officials in the vicinity of that post. In this letter it is intimated that the Intelligence Service of the Army is interested in the American Federation of Labor as an element potentially hostile to the Government of this country. I have since learned that this letter has been printed on page 122 of the Nation of January 31, 1923.

The Military Intelligence Division does not conduct in time of peace any investigations of the nature indicated by the above-mentioned officer. I am sure you will agree with me that the utterly ridiculous assertion that the American Federation of Labor should be considered as an organization having as its object the overthrow of the Government should not even be accorded the dignity of a denial. I have directed a thorough investigation of this matter and propose to apply such corrective and disciplinary measures as may prove to be merited.

I sincerely regret this incident and hope that you will attach to it only the importance which should be given to the thoughtless and immature action of a young man whose enthusiasm has completely dwarfed his judgment and discretion.

Yours very truly,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

GEN. ULYSSES GRANT M'ALEXANDER.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, many distinguished officers of the United States Army have at various times been in command of Fort Douglas, Utah. None has ever been held in higher esteem by the people of my State than the present commander, Gen. Ulysses Grant McAlexander.

The record of the part taken by the Thirty-eighth United States Infantry at the second battle of the Marne under command of General McAlexander is one that thrills every American citizen. For three days this particular regiment under the command of General McAlexander held in check the flower of the German army. Near the close of the third day the order came down to the general to fall back if he saw fit. Immediately he sent back an inquiry in this form: "Is it left to me to decide?" The answer came back, "Yes." Instantly he replied, "Then we shall hold our line." History records that this regiment did hold its line even though it was shot to ribbons, and the record of its heroism is one of the most glorious pages in the history of the World War. [Applause.]

To-night at 8.15 in the Caucus Room of the House Office Building General McAlexander, the Rock of the Marne, will tell the story of the second battle of the Marne and the part that the Thirty-eighth Regiment took in that battle.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it be illustrated?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Not so far as I am informed. I trust that every Member of the House together with all the friends he may see fit to invite, may have the privilege of hearing this address by this distinguished patriot and soldier. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its chief clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 35.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to print, as an appendix to his last annual report, full copies of all telegraphic and other correspondence between the Department of Justice and public officers and agents, private persons, railroad companies, and their officers and agents, in the year 1922, relative to the disorders in the United States of America during said year, and to the action taken by the Government of the United States in suppressing the same.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 36.

Whereas the United States transport St. Mihiel is expected to arrive at Savannah, Ga., on or about February 7, 1923, with last contingent of American troops from Germany; Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators to be designated by the President of the Senate and five Members of the House of Representatives to be designated by the Speaker is authorized to represent the Congress at Savannah, Ga., at such ceremonies as may be determined to be proper and appropriate; one-half of the expense of such committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. To-day is suspension day. The Unanimous Consent Calendar is in order.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, it seems that some misinformation has gone to the Members in regard to the business of to-day. I understood myself that this would be District of Columbia day, but it seems that my informant meant that we would have the regular order, which the Speaker has stated to be suspension day.

The Committee on the District of Columbia has been denied its day three times on account of the death of Members, and not less than three times on account of other matters which were understood to be more pressing—broad national affairs, which were more important than anything that has to do with the District of Columbia. But I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on the District of Columbia is here this morning and have been and will be, but without the power to designate a day for the consideration of their business or to set aside other business for that of the District of Columbia. And I want to say that if anything is to be done for the District of Columbia during this Congress we must get a day very soon. We have on the calendar a bill for the codification of the insurance laws of the District of Columbia which are now operating in a most haphazard fashion and concerning which I have been importuned by many people; also the accountancy bill. In every State of the Union except the District of Columbia there is an accountancy law. Then there is the school teachers' salary bill, which we hope may be considered. We know there is some objection to it, but at least we should have a framework, an organic act, which we have not had since 1906; also the opening of Fourteenth Street, and other measures of greater or less importance.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The newspapers of the city heralded it yesterday that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was going to give us a day for the District of Columbia to-day, and everyone has made plans accordingly. Has there been any change of that program?

Mr. FOCHT. Of course the distinguished parliamentarian from Texas knows that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has nothing whatever to do with the setting apart of a day for the consideration of District business.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Of course every one knows—

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a second?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I notice the gentleman speaks of the codification of the laws of the District. I want to say that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws has had men at work codifying the laws of the District and we would be glad to have the assistance of your committee to tell us what ought to be done.

Mr. FOCHT. Well, with the aid of the gentleman from Texas we can tell you everything that ought to be done. Now, I want to say that I have waited and submitted patiently, in fact I have nothing else to do but submit patiently. There was a time when you could go to the Speaker and find out what was going to be done, but now as long as we have the Committee on Rules you can not find this most potent invisible agency. Of course, we must have a delegated power, but I have nothing to do with fixing the time, but am ready at all times to obey the will of the House. The Committee on the District of Columbia is here now, it has been here, and it will be here ready to do the business that pertains to the District. We are ready to-day and it is not the fault of committee members if the business is not taken up.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution with reference to the Almas Temple, granting them space for the meeting here in June, when there will be many Masons from all over the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no right to entertain the request of the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The Chair has frequently stated that the rules have taken away from the Chair the power of recognition. The gentleman can put it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and in that way bring it up.

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that we had better proceed with the regular business.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the regular business is the District of Columbia, that by the rules of the House to-day is District of Columbia day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. To-day is the first Monday of the month, and the order of business is the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

LAC DU FLAMBEAU BAND, LAKE SUPERIOR CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 6428, a bill for the enrollment and allotment of the Lac du Flambeau band of Lake Superior Chippewas in the State of Wisconsin and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that go over for two weeks.

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been up twice before and was objected to. I have submitted because I have felt that it might be possible to get the information necessary to convince the gentleman from Wisconsin and lead him to withdraw his opposition. I have endeavored in every way to get the information for my colleague in order that he might be willing to consent to the bill being passed. I would like to ask him, in order that I may be able to bring the proper information, just what are his real objections.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before this bill was called up I assured the gentleman that I would go out of my way and see Mr. MERRITT. My colleague suggested last week that Mr. MERRITT would call upon me and give me the information. Mr. MERRITT has not called on me, and I am going to do my colleague the courtesy of calling upon Mr. MERRITT and getting the information to remove, if possible, the objections I have to the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the bill be passed for two weeks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13459) extending the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission and making available funds appropriated under authority of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917, for the purpose of controlling the floods of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to Rock Island, Ill., and for the purpose of controlling the floods of the tributaries of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio River and Rock Island, Ill., including levee protection and bank protection, in so far as said tributaries are affected by the flood waters of the Mississippi River.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FIXING SALARIES OF AUDITOR AND DEPUTY AUDITOR, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3617) to fix the salaries of the auditor and deputy auditor of the Philippine Islands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I object.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may keep its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CREATING TWO JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, STATE OF INDIANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8573) to create two judicial districts within the State of Indiana, the establishment of judicial divisions therein, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. HICKEY. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. We have had this bill up several times. There are still 20 judges unappointed, and I object.

ASSAULT UPON LETTER CARRIERS.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2573) to amend section 198 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have given some consideration to this proposed amendment of the code. I would like to know why it is necessary to vest jurisdiction in the Federal courts over assaults committed upon letter carriers as is purposed in this amendment. I would think that the State courts would give ample protection to carriers in the matter of assaults that might be made upon them. The report is not very illuminating in stating in what particular the State courts are inadequate to give the necessary protection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the gentleman that the bill is reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and passed the Senate. It is a Senate bill. It came over here and was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. We sent for the Solicitor General; and Mr. Donnelly, of the Post Office Department, in the Solicitor General's office, was heard at considerable length upon the very point which the gentleman very properly raises. The Penal Code passed in 1909 contains a provision exactly as is proposed in this bill, but, as stated by the Attorney General and by the Postmaster General, and repeated by Mr. Donnelly, who is in the solicitor's office, when the Penal Code was revised in 1916 this clause was inadvertently omitted. They have let it run along until recently, when there was a very aggravated assault upon a mail carrier which would not have occurred if he had been a private citizen. They found that there was no way to protect the mail carrier or the mail.

Mr. STAFFORD. Wherein would there be no protection extended by the State law in an assault committed on a letter carrier? I can not conceive of any State lacking in protection to any citizen of the State.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is a law to protect the mail carriers in the line of their official duties, and was the law long before the penal code was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is there not a statute now that prohibits anybody from interfering with the mail? It is a frequent occurrence to have people indicted for that. If a man assaults a mail carrier when he is not on duty, the State statutes prosecute him, and if he is on duty when the assault occurs there is a statute under which he can be prosecuted for interfering with the mail.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is strongly urged by both the Postmaster General and the Attorney General as necessary because of recent cases that have arisen, and they say that the original clause as it was in the Penal Code up to 1916 was omitted by inadvertence.

Mr. STAFFORD. They do not say that directly in the report.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; they do.

Mr. STAFFORD. My reading of it does not lead me to that conclusion.

Mr. STEENERSON. It was so stated by Postmaster General Work, and Mr. Donnelly repeated it. That is the explanation given by them and by the Attorney General. It was omitted by inadvertence.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly answer the question and tell us wherein the State law is inadequate to give protection.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Federal laws ought to protect the mail wherever it goes, and the Government ought to protect its own mail carriers. The State laws are all right, but this is no interference with State jurisdiction. This was the law for a long time and no State ever found any fault with it. It ought to be within the power of the United States Government to protect its own mail carriers from assaults which are occasioned through their performance of duty. This applies only where the mail carrier is acting in line of duty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming that there is need for having this jurisdiction vested in the Federal courts, does the gentleman believe that the assailant of a letter carrier should be punished for assault when it is done through cause or provocation?

Mr. STEENERSON. In such case it would not be an assault.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; it would. Mr. Speaker, this is but another instance of a very sloppy method of an attempt to reenact former provisions of the criminal code.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I was about to address myself to the Chair—

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I imagine that the gentleman is going to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not said that I would object.

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold the demand for the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. When this provision was originally in the criminal code it did not provide "shall willfully or maliciously assault any letter or mail carrier." This bill has gone through the grist of the Department of Justice. Of course, I know that the Postmaster General is very busy in the matter of appointments to Federal office, and yet I am somewhat surprised that they were not careful enough to have the law written as it really did exist previously. The law formerly read, "shall willfully and maliciously assault." That is the way the law read prior to the revision of which the gentleman speaks, as found in 35 Statutes at Large, page 1136. I can quite understand how the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has great regard for the report of the Senate, particularly as this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, presided over by that great Senator from Minnesota, whose eightieth birthday has just been fittingly celebrated, and how he should have accepted this without looking up the statute itself to find out how the original law read. As I say, it read "willfully and maliciously," and not "willfully or maliciously." If the gentleman can give any good reason why there should be such a change, I may not object, notwithstanding that I am strongly of the opinion that the State laws give adequate protection.

Mr. STEENERSON. We had this matter up before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads when Mr. Donnelly was there, and some members of the committee examined the old statute to see how it was. It seems to me that it is preferable to have it read "willfully or maliciously."

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not inclined to agree with the gentleman. I think the assault should be with malice. There may be an assault with provocation.

Mr. STEENERSON. I regret very much that the language does not receive the gentleman's approval.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, to make a long story short, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

CLOSING PINEY BRANCH ROAD BETWEEN SEVENTEENTH AND TAYLOR STREETS AND SIXTEENTH AND ALLISON STREETS NW.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1066) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close Piney Branch Road between Seventeenth and Taylor Streets and Sixteenth and Allison Streets NW., rendered useless or unnecessary by reason of the opening and extension of streets called for in the permanent highway plan of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LANDS PURCHASED FOR INDIANS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1926) to extend the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, as amended, to lands purchased for Indians.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will some gentleman of the Committee on Indian Affairs give me an explanation why this was not included in the omnibus private claims bill which we had up on Saturday last?

Mr. HAYDEN. It was reported out after that legislation, and being a Senate bill, we are handling it in this way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give me some explanation of the bill? I do not on the spur of the moment just recall the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. The purpose of the bill can be briefly stated. Under the terms of the general allotment act of 1887 lands within a treaty or Executive order reservation may be allotted to Indians. Any qualified Indian may receive a half section of grazing land, a quarter section of ordinary farming land, or 40 acres of irrigated land. There are certain Indian reservations consisting of lands that have been purchased for Indians, or where treaties prevent allotments, so that the entire tract belongs to the tribe in common ownership. The committee believed that as a general policy it is the part of wisdom to divide such lands among the Indians. The gentleman will note in the report that certain lands have been purchased for Indians in California and that in Minnesota and other places specified there are treaties with the Indians which prevent allotments in severalty. The committee believed that this legislation should apply not only as to the past, but also to the future.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have some question as to whether it should be extended to lands purchased in the future.

Mr. HAYDEN. The situation is the same whenever we buy land for a tribe of Indians. Certainly Congress will intend to teach the members of that tribe, the same as any other tribe, the virtues of individual ownership of property and get them away from their communal ideas. It is for the purpose of teaching the Indians individualism.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was not the original purpose of the purchase so it could be used for the whole tribe and not allotted to individuals?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; not in any instance. It merely happened that the law did not provide at the time of the purchase that the land could be allotted.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That unless otherwise specifically provided, the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., p. 388), as amended, be, and they are hereby, extended to all lands heretofore purchased or which may hereafter be purchased by authority of Congress for the use or benefit of any individual Indian or band or tribe of Indians.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONVEYANCE OF MARINE HOSPITAL RESERVATION, WILMINGTON, N. C.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13046) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Wilmington, N. C., a marine hospital reservation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to convey to the city of Wilmington, New Hanover County, State of North Carolina, by the usual quitclaim deed, at a fair valuation to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, the following-described tract of land with all structures and improvements thereon, being the marine hospital reservation in the city of Wilmington, which in the opinion of the said Secretary of the Treasury is no longer needed for marine hospital purposes, to wit: Fifteen acres, more or less, covering four whole and two one-half city blocks, lying between Eighth and Tenth Streets and extending from Ann Street on the north to a point about 125 feet north of the north line of Nun Street, in the city of Wilmington, county of New Hanover, State of North Carolina.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "Treasury," insert "but not less than $20,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. After the word "but" insert "for."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: After the word "but" insert "for."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Line 10, page 1, strike out the word "which" and insert "if," and after the word "Treasury," in line 11, insert the word "it," so as to read "if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury it is no longer needed."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CONVEYANCE OF MARINE HOSPITAL RESERVATION, WILMINGTON, N. C.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Wilmington," strike out the word "which" and insert the word "if," and in line 11, after the word "Treasury," insert the word "it."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote and—

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object. There is no necessity offering everyone of these motions to recommit. There is not going to be a reconsideration—

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ABANDONING AND DECLARING NONNAVIGABLE SOUTH FORK OF CHICAGO RIVER.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9049) abandoning and declaring nonnavigable a portion of the west arm of the South Fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will that prevent my moving to suspend the rules to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be disposed to recognize the gentleman if he made it now.

Mr. STAFFORD. The facts are these: Before the Chair recognizes the gentleman to suspend the rules, I only want to present my proposition—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we threshed this out once before. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. No. I ask the gentleman to reserve it for a minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold my demand for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. In going over this calendar I was under the impression that this is the same bill that we considered three weeks ago under unanimous consent, so I informed the two gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. DENISON and Mr. GRAHAM] that as there was going to be a day set aside this week when bills from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will be in order I would review this in the meantime, and I did not think there would be any objection. I have not gone over this in the meantime. I was laboring under the impression that this was the same bill that we passed a few weeks ago, but I was told a few minutes ago that it is different.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, while there is a day set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, there is very important legislation pending from that committee that will take up all that time. I am sorry the gentleman has not had the time to look into this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I have time always to examine every bill placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. I attempted to bring this bill up two weeks ago, but unfortunately it was not then on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The Speaker will remember about this bill. I spoke to the Speaker about it. There are a number of Members interested in this bill, and it is of great importance.

Mr. BLANTON. It is practically the same as the other that we threshed out two weeks ago, is it not?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was objection to closing all the west fork of the south branch. This may include that very purpose. There was no objection to the other proposal acted upon three weeks ago. I only ask the privilege and opportunity of going over this report.

The SPEAKER. If this bill is considered to be important, it is evident that there is no time to waste, and therefore the Chair is inclined to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to ask for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-three Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the motion is pending or not, but I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I did not understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood he objected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understood the matter was pending, and that he did not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; I asked unanimous consent that the bill be passed over. Objection was made by the other side. The gentleman from Illinois then moved to suspend the rules, but did not get very far with that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill again.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9049) abandoning and declaring nonnavigable a portion of the west arm of the South Fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of September 19, 1890, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes (26 Stat., chap. 907, sec. 7, p. 454), and the act of March 3, 1899, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes (30 Stat., chap. 425, sec. 9, p. 1151), and all acts amendatory of either thereof shall not after the passage of this act apply to that portion of the west arm of the south fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River, lying between the east line of Ashland Avenue and the north line of Thirty-ninth Street, in the city of Chicago, Ill., as the same now exists or may hereafter be extended.

All rights, authority, or control over that part of the Chicago River now possessed or assumed by the United States under said acts, or either of them or any amendments thereof, are hereby relinquished and abandoned, and all rights, authority, or control over the same that were possessed by the State of Illinois before said acts were passed are hereby fully restored to said State.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand a second.

Mr. DENISON. My motion should have been to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. It was read in that way. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands a second.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not very unusual for a bill to be brought up under suspension of the rules at the beginning of the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar instead of at the end of the calendar?

The SPEAKER. No; the bill was reached and objected to, and the Chair recognized the gentleman at that time. The Chair usually does that.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is certainly unfair to other Members having bills on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes we can finish the calendar to-day.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this question involves simply a small part of the west arm of the south fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River, about 1,000 feet long, lying between Ashland Avenue and what would be the intersection of Thirty-ninth Street in the city of Chicago. A short distance from the lake the Chicago River divides into the North and South Branches, and then about 3 miles farther south it divides into the west fork and south fork of the South Branch, and the south fork again formerly subdivided into the west arm and the south arm. The south arm has been filled up already, leaving the west arm extending down as far as Ashland Avenue. Further on, beyond Ashland Avenue, it has also been filled up, so that that arm of the river stops at a bulkhead at Ashland Avenue, and there is now there a stub arm of the south fork of the South Branch of the river. There is no water flowing into it from the surface. It is a slip or stub end of that branch of the river. Thirty-ninth Street would intersect it, but it has never had a bridge over it, so that Thirty-ninth Street, running east and west, comes to this branch of the river, stops there, and then continues on beyond on the other side.

That section of the city of Chicago has been very much developed by manufacturing plants, and there is now no way to pass across the city from east to west, and vice versa, in a large area there except by detouring some distance to the north or some distance to the south. They want to extend Thirty-ninth Street over this part of the Chicago River, but before they can do so under the existing law they must go to the Secretary of War, submit plans for a bridge, and obtain his approval, and they must also get the consent of Congress to construct the bridge. To build a bridge over that part of the river, a draw or lift bridge would cost a very large amount of money; the Secretary of War would require such a bridge, and it was claimed in the hearings that it would cost something like $2,000,000, to say nothing of the cost of maintenance. Such an expense would be prohibitive and would prevent the construction of the bridge, which is very much desired and needed.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is there any real navigation on this stub end of the river?

Mr. DENISON. I will discuss that point now. In 1919 the city of Chicago wanted consent to fill up this stub end for 1,000 feet up to Thirty-ninth Street, so that they could run the street right over it. In other words, they wanted permission to cut off that much of the stub end of the river and fill it up. It has been used principally for sewerage purposes. It is offensive, insanitary, and unsightly, and there is no commerce on it. They made application to the Secretary of War for permission to fill it up; he rendered a decision that he could not give his consent, because it was a navigable waterway of the United States. It is because of that fact or that ruling of the Secretary of War that Representative RAINEY originally introduced this bill for the consent of Congress to fill up that arm of the river. That was the form in which the bill was introduced, granting the consent of Congress to declare it nonnavigable and fill it up. The bill was referred to our committee, and a subcommittee was appointed who held hearings in Chicago. The city of Chicago wants to fill it up so that it can make these necessary improvements, extend Thirty-ninth Street over it, and give the people in those two sections an opportunity to pass to and fro from one side of the city to the other.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Identically the same principles are involved in this bill that were involved in a Senate bill which we passed a short time ago concerning another portion of the river, are they not?

Mr. DENISON. Practically the same question.

Mr. BLANTON. If there was no objection to the other bill, why should there be any to this?

Mr. DENISON. I do not think there should be; the other bill involved the West Fork, which extended several miles onto the west side of the city, while this bill involves a little slip of the South Fork just about 1,000 feet in length. If this bill carries, it means that the United States, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, withdraws the exercise of its jurisdiction over that little part of the river and leaves it to the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois to determine these conflicting questions as to sanitation and what improvements, if any, should be permitted over that particular part of the river.

As a matter of fact this part of the river has enough water in it and is of sufficient width to be navigable for tows, scows, or barges. There is no navigation on it—that is, there is no commerce on it. There are no docks and wharves on it now, and there has been no substantial commerce on it for the past 30 years, according to the testimony. But as a matter of fact it is navigable if a person wanted to so use it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would not a great deal of power be necessary to plow through the filth and dirt and scum that is in the river at this point.

Mr. DENISON. That is very true. Of course, the water is black and thick and has no flow. It is stagnant and offensive. Sewers discharge into it, and it is not fit for navigation or for any other purpose. It is practically a sewer. But the committee did not feel that we could recommend the passage of an act declaring a stream nonnavigable that is in fact navigable. There is some question as to whether such an act would be valid or not. I believe the courts have held that an act declaring a stream to be navigable which was in fact not navigable was not valid. So the committee concluded that the bill should be amended and that we should not pass a direct declaration that that part of the river was nonnavigable. So we decided to get at it in a different way.

Congress has jurisdiction over rivers of this kind under the commerce clause of the Constitution. In other words, the commerce clause of the Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce on navigable rivers, and the courts have held that where a navigable waterway lies wholly within the boundaries of a State Congress has concurrent jurisdiction with the State over the regulation of commerce on that river. In the absence of action by Congress the State can control it absolutely, but whatever action the State takes is subject to such modification as Congress may afterwards decide to adopt. But where Congress has once acted, then the State can not take any action inconsistent with the act of Congress.

Now, in the report filed by the committee, we have reviewed at some length the legal questions and decisions of the courts, and we found that Congress has passed two acts dealing with this subject, in which Congress has assumed to exercise its jurisdiction over all navigable waterways in the United States. So the committee concluded that inasmuch as there is now practically no commerce on this part of the river and certainly none of an interstate character, and since there has been none for the past 30 years, and as there is no Federal question involved and the city of Chicago wants to fill up this part of the river and the State of Illinois objects to it, we would recommend that Congress dispose of the matter in the manner set out in the bill. The State of Illinois is engaged in the enterprise of aiding in the constructing of a deep waterway project from the Lakes to the Gulf, and has issued $20,000,000 of bonds for that purpose, and is engaged in deepening the Des Plaines River, which will connect the Illinois River with the Chicago River through the Sanitary Canal; and they hope in the future to have a barge system connecting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River. They think they will need all the branches of the Chicago River for terminal purposes. That is a matter that is one of the problems of the future for the State of Illinois. We do not know now to what extent these branches of the Chicago River will be needed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I see there has been some communication between the authorities in Chicago and the Secretary of War. That was in 1919. Has this bill been referred to the Secretary of War or to the Chief of Engineers, so that we may have the benefit of their opinion? The only communication up to this time with the War Department or the Chief of Engineers has been by the authorities in Chicago, and that was several years ago, and that was not in relation to this bill. What I want to ask is, has this bill been referred to the War Department, and have you any communication from the Chief of Engineers or the Secretary of War as to the advisability of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman evidently thinks that this is a bridge building bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; I know it is not.

Mr. DENISON. In 1919 Congress by affirmative action declared that we would not spend any money on this part of the Chicago River; we adopted that as a policy. So we do not intend hereafter, according to that act of Congress, to spend any money on it as a Federal project. This bill as originally filed was to abandon that part of the river and permit it to be filled up. The recommendation of the committee is merely that the two acts of Congress by which the Federal Government exercised its jurisdiction over this and all navigable waterways be held not to apply to this particular part of the Chicago River. In other words, we withdraw all jurisdiction that we have assumed over that part of the Chicago River and leave the State of Illinois and the city of Chicago to dispose of the questions involved as they think best in the interest of the public welfare.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is exactly as I understand it. Now, I ask the question again, Has the matter been referred to the War Department and the Chief of Engineers, and have we anything from them in relation to it?

Mr. DENISON. I am unable to answer the gentleman's question at this time. I shall have to consult the chairman of the committee about that. Now, gentlemen, the simple question involved in this legislation is not whether we will grant permission to fill up this arm of the river, but whether, in view of the fact that the problems involved are of importance principally to the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois, and the further fact that no substantial commerce or interstate traffic is involved, we will let the Federal Government stand aside and let the State and local governments settle the questions as they think best. We simply repeal the acts of Congress which assume jurisdiction over that part of the river and leave the State of Illinois to deal with that branch of the river so far as the State thinks it needs protection from the acts of the city. The city of Chicago and the State of Illinois are the two parties who are most directly concerned. There seems to the committee to be no Federal question involved.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Certainly.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman inform the House whether if this part of the river is filled in the property would revert to the State or the adjoining owners?

Mr. DENISON. It would go to the adjoining owners, I think, under the law of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill is necessary in order to permit a very much needed improvement in the city of Chicago. Thirty-ninth Street goes through a very populous part of the city, on the South Side, and for a stretch of a mile and a half north and south through that part of the city there is no way to get across the Chicago River by any bridge. A great manufacturing district has sprung up down there. The Government has built many large warehouses, quartermaster's depots on Thirty-ninth Street, and Thirty-ninth Street, a broad thoroughfare, goes from the west for several miles to the Chicago River and then stops. People who live in that section, hundreds of thousands of people, have to travel north or south to go across the river, over a stretch of a mile and a half. It is essential that this highway be continued toward Lake Michigan. There is not any way to do much under present circumstances except by the building of a very expensive bridge, which has been estimated to cost several million dollars. The river at that place is about 250 feet wide. Not very long ago the condition of this river was such that it was testified to before the committee that men could walk out on the sewage which was lying in that part of the stream, and that it would support their weight. It is the worst condition of water that I ever saw in my life. It is putrid, the stench is overpowering, and extends over all that country, and it lies there in that dead end of the river, where there is no circulation and where it is impossible to tell which is water and which is sewage. If this bill be passed it will permit the making of an improvement there which is very much desired.

We are more interested, I imagine, in transportation as a whole than we are in either the improvement of waterways or of railways or of any other particular kind of transportation. If the people of the United States have any particular need at this time, it is transportation. We have found that by this improvement millions of people can be provided an outlet through this city, and without it this whole arm or river will lie there and be of no importance, no value to anybody. This improvement will provide the local authorities with a way in which they can condemn the river and have it filled if they desire to do so and make a way across it.

Under the law as it exists the situation is somewhat peculiar. I refer gentlemen now to the report on this bill, and incidentally pause long enough to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], of our committee, prepared this report. He went into the law extensively and has prepared a brief which ought to be a sort of textbook for Congress in the future on the question of the navigability of rivers and the control of the State and the Federal Government over such rivers. He has gone into the matter very exhaustively. The report has been prepared with much care. The law, in brief, is that the various States of the Union have full control over the navigability of the various streams within their boundaries, and if the jurisdiction of Congress is not superimposed upon that power of the State so that it takes it away under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, the State still has full power and authority to do anything and everything with reference to the navigability or use of the various streams in the various States. We are trying to take away from this stream the effect of the acts of Congress and leave it as it originally was, so that the State of Illinois may have full power to cope with the situation, if the State and the city can agree on the improvement whereby at some time they can remove this insanitary condition and make possible the building of this highway across there. If that can be accomplished, it is something devoutly to be wished for. We have so arranged by this amendment that the acts of Congress by which we took jurisdiction over this river are repealed and full jurisdiction is, therefore, left in the State of Illinois to handle the whole question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Even if the State of Illinois should conclude to retain this stub end for the use of barges, the cost of a bridge under these circumstances would be much less than under Federal control?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Because there would be no necessity for making a drawbridge, or one of those rising bridges which must provide for the passage of ships of large size. In other words, so long as the Federal Government retains control if a bridge is to be constructed it would have to be a bridge of such character as would permit the passage through the stream of the kind of ships which never will pass through it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; and it is very likely that if the State concludes it wants to keep this piece of river open for any purpose, it will provide for a fixed bridge.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would any costs or charges be imposed upon the United States by virtue of this contemplated improvement?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Nothing whatever.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the city of Chicago and does the State of Illinois favor this measure?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The city of Chicago is earnestly in favor of it and is doing everything to bring it about. The waterway authorities of the State of Illinois are opposed to it. That is, they state that under present conditions they would want to take some steps to preserve their rights before they would agree to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the purpose of the bill is to leave that matter open for agreement between the city and the State?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; and until the State of Illinois is satisfied, not a spadeful of earth can be removed.

Mr. CHALMERS. Does the brief prepared by Mr. Denison cover canals as well as navigable rivers?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; it does not. He goes into a question which has been very confusing. That is just why Congress has this authority over these streams, and how much authority the States had before Congress stepped in. It covers all those questions. It is a very comprehensive brief and I think it is well worth reading.

Mr. CHALMERS. I was interested in the concurrent jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the State in the operation of canals.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. He does not go into that.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. I am interested in what the gentleman says about Mr. Denison's brief on this question of the rights of the United States in navigable streams. Could not the gentleman arrange to have the brief printed in the Record?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think it would be very helpful, and I see no reason why it should not be done, and I think a little later I shall follow the suggestion of the gentleman and ask unanimous consent to have it incorporated. It is not very long, and it ought to be preserved in some way.

Under the leave to extend my remarks, I now include that portion of the report referring to the legal questions involved:

Several briefs on the legal questions involved were presented both by those favoring and those opposed to the bill. These briefs are printed in full in the hearings. The committee has considered carefully the cases cited and many others and finds that the legal principles applicable to the proposed legislation and to the action which the committee recommends are well settled.

Under the common law of England, title to the land under all navigable waters was in the sovereign in trust for the public, and this title gave to the sovereign exclusive right to regulate all commerce on the navigable waters of the realm.

That doctrine applied in the British colonies in this country, and the exclusive right to regulate commerce on the navigable waters of the colonies was in the British Government. At first the navigable waters were held to be confined to the tide waters, but later by analogy the principle was extended by the courts to include all of the navigable rivers of the interior, as well as those affected by the tide waters.

When the American colonies declared and won their independence the different States became themselves sovereign governments and succeeded to all of the sovereign rights that had theretofore belonged to the Crown, including the rights over the navigable waterways within their respective boundaries. When, therefore, the representatives of the different States met in the Constitutional Convention in 1787, the States possessed and exercised the sovereign right of controlling and regulating commerce on all their navigable waterways.

By section 8 of Article I of the Constitution the States surrendered to the Federal Government the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. This is the source and the only source of all the power that the Federal Government now has over the navigable waterways of the United States. The source and the extent of this power of the Federal Government have been given judicial interpretation and declaration in innumerable cases that are found in the reported decisions. And the law is well settled that by the commerce clause of the Constitution the States surrendered and the Federal Government received plenary power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and that power includes the right to improve all the navigable waterways of the United States and regulate the commerce thereon.

It is also well settled that where Congress has assumed and exercises its jurisdiction over a navigable waterway within a State the State can not enact any law which would conflict with the Federal jurisdiction so exercised. But it is also well settled that Congress and the State legislatures have concurrent jurisdiction over the improvement of navigable waterways within the States. While the States surrendered to the Federal Government this power to regulate the navigable waterways and the commerce thereon, yet until Congress acts in the exercise of that power the States themselves have the right to improve and otherwise regulate the navigable waters and the commerce thereon within their respective borders, and after Congress has acted in the exercise of its power the States may still act so long as the exercise of their powers does not conflict with the action of the Federal Government.

Some of the courts state the jurisdictional question in substantially the following form:

"All rights over the navigable waterways within a particular State not surrendered to the Federal Government by the commerce clause of the Constitution are retained by the State government; but it is the exercise and not the mere possession of the powers conferred upon the Federal Government that limits the freedom of action by the State. Jurisdiction over the navigable waterways within the State is concurrent in the State and Federal Government, but that of the Federal Government, when exercised, is supreme. No action can be taken by the State which conflicts with any action taken by the Federal Government, and any action taken by the State is subject to change or nullification by any subsequent action that may be taken by the Federal Government in the exercise of its supreme jurisdiction."

The cases of Cooley v. Board of Wardens (13 Howard, 299) and Covington Bridge Co. v. Kentucky (154 U. S. 204) clearly state these principles. The Minnesota Rate cases (230 U. S. 352) assert the same doctrine with reference to the regulation of commerce on railroads.

In Gould on Waters, third edition, page 80, the author says:

"Under the Constitution of the United States a State has the right, if its legislation does not conflict with the action of Congress upon the same subject, to authorize bridges and dams across the navigable waters within its limits; to license wharves, piers, and docks intruding upon such waters; to establish harbor lines to which wharves may be extended; to prescribe the places and manner in which vessels may lie in a harbor, what lights they are to carry at night, or what course they shall pursue in navigating a river; to pass reasonable quarantine and inspection laws and pilotage or port regulations; to regulate harbor beacons, buoys, salvage, and similar matters of a local and limited nature; to improve the navigability of its waters and to authorize the collection of tolls in consideration of such improvements."

In Cummings v. Chicago (188 U. S. 410) the Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Harlan, said, speaking of the Calumet River, which is also in the city of Chicago:

"Calumet River, it must be remembered, is entirely within the limits of Illinois, and the authority of the State over it is plenary, subject only to such action as Congress may take in execution of its power under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States. That authority has been exercised by the State ever since it was admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States."

In the case of Wilson v. The Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. (2 Peters, 245), a case involving the authority of a State legislature to authorize a dam to be built across a navigable creek, the Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Marshall, said:

"The act of assembly by which the plaintiffs were authorized to construct their dam shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks passing through a deep, level marsh adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved."

"Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the General Government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States. But the measure authorized by this act stops a navigable creek and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it. But this abridgment, unless it comes to conflict with the Constitution or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens, of which this court can take no cognizance."

"The counsel for the plaintiffs in error insist that it comes in conflict with the power of the United States 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.'"

"If Congress has passed any act which bore upon the case, any act in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was to control State legislation over those small navigable creeks into which the tide flows, and which abound throughout the lower country of the Middle and Southern States, we should feel not much difficulty in saying that a State law coming in conflict with such act would be void. But Congress has passed no such act. The repugnancy of the law of Delaware to the Constitution is placed entirely on its repugnancy to the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, a power which has not been so exercised as to affect the question."

"We do not think that the act empowering the Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. to place a dam across the creek can, under all the circumstances of the case, be considered as repugnant to the power to regulate commerce in its dormant state or as being in conflict with any law passed on the subject."

Many more cases might be cited which affirm the power of the State to regulate, improve, or even destroy the navigable character of a waterway within its borders unless Congress has exercised jurisdiction over the particular waterway in question. In the case of Huse v. Glover (15 Fed. Rep. 292) the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, said:

"The doctrines of the adjudged cases sustain the authority of this State—there being no act of Congress forbidding it—to construct locks and dams upon the Illinois River. Her avowed object in so doing was to improve the navigation of that river and effect a reduction of freights to the headwaters of Lake Michigan and to the Mississippi River. The mode and extent of such improvement, in the absence of national legislation, based upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce, was for her determination. Her discretion in such matters is not to be controlled by the courts so long as Congress does not interfere."

And when that case went to the Supreme Court, that court, speaking through Mr. Justice Field (119 U. S. 543), said:

"The State is interested in the domestic as well as in the interstate and foreign commerce conducted on the Illinois River; and to increase its facilities and thus augment its growth it has full power. It is only when in the judgment of Congress its action is deemed to encroach upon the navigation of the river as a means of interstate and foreign commerce that that body may interfere and control or supersede it. If in the opinion of the State greater benefit would result to her commerce by the improvements made than by leaving the river in its natural state—and on that point the State must necessarily determine for itself—it may authorize them, although increased inconvenience and expense may thereby result to the business of individuals. The private inconvenience must yield to the public good. The opening of a new highway or the improvement of an old one, the building of a railroad, and many other works in which the public is interested, may materially diminish business in certain quarters and increase it in others, yet for the loss resulting the sufferers have no legal ground of complaint. How the highways of a State, whether on land or by water, shall be best improved for the public good is a matter for State determination, subject always to the right of Congress to interfere in the cases mentioned. (Spooner v. McConnell, 1 McLean, 337; Kellogg v. Union Co., 12 Conn. 7; Thames Bank v. Lovell, 18 Conn. 500; S. C. 46 Am. Dec. 332; McReynolds v. Smallhouse, 8 Bush. 447.)"

It is clear from these cases and others that might be cited that so long as the right of the Federal Government to regulate navigable waterways within a State, conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution, lies dormant the States may act for that purpose and to such extent as they choose, and after the Federal Government acts in the exercise of the power conferred upon it the States may still act in the exercise of their concurrent jurisdiction, but their action must not conflict with the action of the Federal Government.

Now, in the act of September 19, 1890, Twenty-sixth Statutes, chapter 907, section 7, page 454, Congress assumed jurisdiction over all navigable waterways in the following language:

"SEC. 7. That it shall not be lawful to build any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, dam, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or structure of any kind outside established harbor lines, or in any navigable waters of the United States where no harbor lines are or may be established, without the permission of the Secretary of War, in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or other waters of the United States, in such manner as shall obstruct or impair navigation, commerce, or anchorage of said waters, and it shall not be lawful hereafter to commence the construction of any bridge, bridge draw, bridge piers and abutments, causeway, or other works over or in any port, road, roadstead, haven, harbor, navigable river, or navigable waters of the United States under any act of the legislative assembly of any State until the location and plan of such bridge or other works have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War, or to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify the course, location, condition, or capacity of the channel of said navigable water of the United States unless approved and authorized by the Secretary of War: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any bridge, bridge draw, bridge piers and abutments the construction of which has been heretofore duly authorized by law, or be so construed as to authorize the construction of any bridge, drawbridge, bridge piers and abutments, or other works under an act of the legislature of any State over or in any stream, port, roadstead, haven, or harbor, or other navigable water not wholly within the limit of such State."

And by the subsequent act of March 3, 1899, Thirtieth Statutes, chapter 425, section 4, page 1151, Congress further exercised its jurisdiction over navigable waterways by the following language:

"SEC. 9. That it shall not be lawful to construct or commence the construction of any bridge, dam, dike, or causeway over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other navigable water of the United States until the consent of Congress to the building of such structure shall have been obtained and until the plans for the same shall have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War: Provided, That such structures may be built under authority of the legislature of a State across rivers and other waterways the navigable portions of which lie wholly within the limits of a single State, provided the location and plans thereof are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War before construction is commenced: And provided further, That when plans for any bridge or other structure have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of said plans has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War."

In the case of Economy Light & Power Co. v. United States of America (256 U. S. 113), the Government sought to enjoin the power company from constructing a dam in the Des Plaines River, Ill., and the question involved was whether or not the Des Plaines River was a navigable waterway of the United States, and if so, what was the effect of the provisions of these acts of Congress just quoted. In the opinion the court said:

"Since it (the Des Plaines River) is a natural interstate waterway, it is within the power of Congress to improve it at the public expense; and it is not difficult to believe that many other streams are in like condition and require only the exertion of Federal control to make them again important avenues of commerce among the States. If they are to be abandoned, it is for Congress, not the courts, so to declare. The policy of Congress is clearly evidenced in the act of 1899, and, in the present case at least, nothing remains but to give effect to it."

This case, which is one of the latest and leading cases, makes it clear, first, that it is within the power of Congress to abandon a navigable waterway if it does not think it wise to expend public funds to improve it; and, second, that by the acts of September 19, 1890, and March 3, 1899, just quoted, Congress has declared its policy and exercised its jurisdiction over navigable waterways conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

In People v. Metropolitan Railway Co. (285 Ill. 246) the question arose as to whether or not, by the acts of September 19, 1890, and of March 3, 1899, Congress assumed exclusive jurisdiction over all the navigable waterways of the country and thereby deprived the States of any further right of control over them. In that case the people of the State of Illinois sought to compel the railway company to remove a certain bridge across the South Branch of the Chicago River on the ground that it had become an obstruction to commerce. After citing the case of The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. v. Ohio (165 U. S. 365), where the Supreme Court held that the State of Ohio still had the right to compel the removal of a bridge unlawfully constructed across a navigable stream, the court said:

"If the act of 1890 did not affect the power of the State to require the removal of an obstruction placed in the stream unlawfully, we do not see how it could affect the authority of the State to require the removal of a structure lawfully placed in a navigable stream, but which has since, because of changed conditions, become an unreasonable obstruction. The subsequent amendatory acts of Congress, including section 18 of the act of March 3, 1899, do not restrict or encroach upon the power the State had, previous to those enactments, been authorized to exercise. Conceding Congress has the power to take sole and exclusive jurisdiction over navigable waters wholly within a State, it has not done so."

The Legislature of the State of Illinois by an act approved June 30, 1913, created the rivers and lakes commission of the State and defined its duties and powers. Section 7 of the act provides as follows:

"Sec. 7. It shall be the duty of said commission to have a general supervision of every body of water within the State of Illinois, wherein the State or the people of the State have any rights or interests, whether the same be lakes or rivers, and at all times to exercise a vigilant care to see that none of said bodies of water are encroached upon or wrongfully seized or used by any private interest in any way, except as may be provided by law, and then only after permission shall be given by said commission, and from time to time for that purpose, to make accurate surveys of the shores of said lakes and rivers, and to jealously guard the same in order that the true and natural conditions thereof may not be wrongfully and improperly changed to the detriment and injury of the State of Illinois."

"The rivers and lakes commission of Illinois shall have power and authority to inquire into encroachment upon, wrongful invasion, and private use of every stream, river, lake, or other body of water in which the State of Illinois has any right or interest. The commission shall have power to make and enforce such orders as will secure every stream, river, lake, or body of water in which the State of Illinois has any right or interest against encroachment, wrongful seizure, or private use."

The committee concludes that the State of Illinois still has concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal Government to regulate that part of the Chicago River involved in the pending bill, and that in the exercise of its jurisdiction and for the purpose of protecting public interests in the navigable waterways of the State, there has been created a State commission, which has full authority to act for that purpose. But the committee further concludes that by the acts of 1890 and 1899, Congress has assumed jurisdiction over that part of the river in question and that neither the city of Chicago nor the State of Illinois can take any action respecting that part of the river except in compliance with those acts of Congress.

In the case of Gillman v. Philadelphia (70 U. S. 729) the court said: "It must not be forgotten that bridges, which are connecting parts of turnpikes, streets, and railroads, are means of commercial transportation, as well as navigable waters, and that the commerce which passes over a bridge may be much greater than would ever be transported on the water it obstructs."

"It is for the municipal power to weigh the considerations which belong to the subject and to decide which shall be preferred and how far either shall be made subservient to the other."

There can be no doubt that Thirty-ninth Street in the city of Chicago ought to be opened for traffic over this arm of the Chicago River, and that some appropriate action should be taken to make that part of the river more sightly and more sanitary. But whether traffic and commerce over a bridge, if one should be constructed, is of more importance than the traffic or commerce that may be hereafter transported over that part of the river, is not a question that Congress can well decide; these are largely local questions that ought to be settled in the public interest by State and local authorities.

The committee feel that Congress should not only not be expected to settle these local questions but that the general power over navigable waterways assumed by the Federal Government by the acts of 1890 and 1899 should not in this instance be permitted to interfere with full freedom of action by the municipal and State authorities. We are unable to see where there is involved any question substantially affecting interstate commerce, and to the end that the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois may themselves freely settle all questions involved, we believe that Congress should abandon the authority it assumed over that part of the river by the acts of 1890 and 1899. Accordingly, we recommended that the pending bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

"That the act of September 19, 1890, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes (26 Stat., ch. 907, sec. 7, p. 454), and the act of March 3, 1899, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes (30 Stat., ch. 425, sec. 9, p. 1151), and all acts amendatory of either thereof shall not, after the passage of this act, apply to that portion of the west arm of the South Fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River lying between the east line of Ashland Avenue and the north line of Thirty-ninth Street in the city of Chicago, Ill., as the same now exists or may hereafter be extended. "All rights, authority, or control over that part of the Chicago River now possessed or assumed by the United States under said acts or either of them or any amendments thereof are hereby relinquished and abandoned, and all rights, authority, or control over the same that were possessed by the State of Illinois before said acts were passed are hereby fully restored to said State."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is much more to be said on this subject except this: The principal reason why it is necessary to close this stub end, a ditch that is stagnant, putrid, and menacing to health, is that for over 40 years or 50 years there has been an effort made to open to the western limits of the city a great avenue of traffic known as Thirty-ninth Street. There is no east and west traffic street between Thirty-fifth and Forty-seventh to the west. That is just a mile and a half; so that people who wish to get to the western limit either have to go across Thirty-fifth or a mile and a half south and cross on Forty-seventh Street. Thirty-ninth Street is right between the two. An investigation shows that the opening of this street will facilitate traffic to such an extent that millions of dollars annually will be saved in transportation costs and time that is almost impossible to calculate will be saved by reason of the opening of this street. Thirty-ninth Street is exactly in the center of the city of Chicago, counting from north to south. It passes through the stockyards territory. The stockyards, as everybody knows, is one of the most tremendous industries in America, but all the territory through this street will pass is occupied by great business, and to the west of that there will be a great residential territory opened on which homes can be erected by those who are employed in the stockyards industries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it proposed, if the State agrees to the closing up of this stub arm, to have the entire canal or slip used for street purposes?

Mr. MADDEN. Just across the point. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that Thirty-ninth Street runs across the slip. The street crosses at right angles, and about 800 feet south of Thirty-ninth Street the slip stops. It is the stub end; and it is proposed to close up the slip from the stub end 800 feet south to the north line of Thirty-ninth Street.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there is no question of the riparian rights of the property owners in the present slip?

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely none whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because the municipality will open it for street purposes if the State will accede?

Mr. MADDEN. It will be opened entirely for the development of Chicago and no other purpose whatever. Many of us have been working on that problem for 20 years, and I personally have been chairman of the improvement association having this development in view, and we have no object in the world except to carry out the Chicago plan of development, and without the opening of this street that plan would be impossible, and all we need now to do is to get authority to close up this menace, that is a putrid pest hole, which is endangering the life of that community, which has no purpose in the world that relates to navigation, does not have any reason to exist, and if there is nothing else in view except the importance of closing it up to relieve the sanitary situation it would be a good work. But it has another purpose in view, and that is the development of this section of Chicago which will enable the carrying out of a great plan for the development of that city.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when the House was considering three weeks ago, under the Unanimous Consent Calendar, a bill providing for declaring nonnavigable a portion of the south branch known as the Loop, there was embodied in that report a suggestion that a proposition was being considered and agitated to close up the long stretch of the west arm which was seriously contested by some of the riparian owners. A scanning of this report showed that the bill had not been referred to the War Department or the Chief of Engineers of late nor had any submission of this question been brought to the attention of the War Department since September, 1919.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. In the hearings had on this subject my understanding is that the local Army engineer appeared before the committee and testified.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to compliment the gentlemen, Messrs. GRAHAM of Illinois, and DENISON, of the subcommittee, who, after adjournment of the last session, went to Chicago and made a personal investigation of all this territory, and I think their opinion, based upon the hearings then had, is sufficient to accept their view that navigation interests will not be affected, and as far as the local quarrel between the great municipality of Chicago, which wishes to close up one of the many cesspools of filth, and the State of Illinois, which wishes to irrigate some of these cesspools by having some of the good liquid water from Lake Michigan enter into it, why I am going to leave that battle to those respective contestants. I am not going strenuously to oppose it, in view of the excellent presentation made by the three gentlemen from Illinois. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McARTHUR). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having, in the opinion of the Chair, voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the title of the bill be amended to conform to the text.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the title of the bill be amended to conform with the text. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by including as a part of them the report filed in this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman just limit it to the parts of the report pertaining to the legal phases of the question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; I will do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2347) for the relief of certain homestead entrymen.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of this bill before the objection stage is passed.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, the bill is very simple. By the act of 1906 we allowed men to make homestead entries in the forest reserves of 160 acres on land which was designated by the Secretary of the Interior as chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and not possessing any considerable value for forest purposes. Now we have enlarged the size of homesteads on land which men may take under other form of the homestead act. The stock raising act, for example, allows a homestead of 640 acres, and the enlarged homestead act allows 320 acres. We have done that on the theory that it is not possible for a man to make a living by stock raising on less than 640 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is intended to give land to men who have hitherto homesteaded in the forest reserves and give others that land?

Mr. VAILE. This would simply give to those who have homesteaded in the national forests the same size of homestead as is possessed by those outside.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. This bill, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] states, is very simple. It does not give anybody any rights to land in the national forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am aware of that.

Mr. SINNOTT. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, under this bill, are permitted to give to the man in the forest reserves the same rights under this bill that one outside the reservation has. That is, a man under the present law having land outside, not in a national forest, may take an additional 160 acres. A man having that land to-day may take an additional 160 acres, but a man owning the land within a national forest has not that right at present. So this is to give the man having land in the national forest, an ordinary nonirrigable, nontimbered, nonmineral piece of land, the right to take an additional 160 acres outside of a national forest. That is all it does.

Mr. VAILE. We ought to give a considerable inducement to lead men to make homesteads there.

Mr. STAFFORD. This applies to men who already have homesteaded on the national forests. They have already taken a homestead in the national forest, and now you want to give them 160 or 180 acres more.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is simply to enlarge it to the extent enjoyed by homesteaders outside.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to passing it over for two weeks.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

COLUMBIA BASIN IRRIGATION PROJECT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3808) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and report to Congress on the Columbia Basin irrigation project.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I withhold it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin reserve the right to object?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this is an authorization; it makes no appropriation, of course. The first item in the bill has already been passed by the Senate. It is a project on which the State of Washington has expended $150,000. They have made all the investigations that they could as a State. They have called in General Goethals—

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite well aware of what the gentleman is saying. It is too important to be considered under unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Let me say to the gentleman that the item in regard to the Colorado basin has already been eliminated by a committee amendment, as that item is already carried in the Interior Department appropriation bill. Of the last item $100,000 is already carried in the Interior Department bill, so that this bill in reality is not what it seems on the face of it and does not carry the amount that the wording would indicate.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are proposing a permanent appropriation of $250,000, a policy which the Congress has never heretofore adopted. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the bill may retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RETIRED PAY OF CERTAIN ENLISTED MEN IN THE COAST GUARD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2187) to regulate the retired pay of certain enlisted men in the Coast Guard.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one which is of particular interest to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr.

MERRITT], who is ill, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed for two weeks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed without prejudice.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MERRIMACK RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13135) to grant the consent of Congress for the special commission constituted by an act of the Legislature of Massachusetts to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that S. 4288, which is identical with this bill and which has passed the Senate, be substituted for this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to substitute S. 4288, and which is now on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 4288), to grant the consent of Congress for the special commission constituted by an act of the Legislature of Massachusetts to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the special commission constituted by chapter 507 of the acts passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts during the session of 1922, and the county commissioners of Essex County, in the State of Massachusetts, acting jointly or separately, and their successors and assigns, to construct or reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Merrimack River at Main Street, in the city of Haverhill, in the county of Essex, in the State of Massachusetts, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, said bridge to replace the present or Haverhill lower bridge, so called, at said location.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] to explain this bill.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this bill asks the consent of Congress for the reconstruction of a bridge across the Merrimack River in Haverhill, which bridge burned some two years ago. The State Legislature of Massachusetts passed an act authorizing the appointment of a special commission to reconstruct the bridge, this special commission to consist of the three county commissioners of Essex County and two other appointees of the governor. The special commission is to reconstruct the bridge and apportion the cost between the city of Haverhill and Essex County. The commissioners in their turn will thereafter have authority to maintain the bridge. On that account the bill has been so worded that the consent of Congress is granted for the special commission constituted by the act of the Legislature of Massachusetts and the county commissioners of Essex County, in the State of Massachusetts, acting jointly or separately, and their successors and assigns, to reconstruct, maintain, and operate the bridge.

The bill has the approval of the War Department and has passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent, the corresponding bill, H. R. 13135, was laid on the table.

CUT-OVER TIMBERLANDS IN THE STATE OF MONTANA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1878) to permit the State of Montana to exchange cut-over timberlands granted for educational purposes for other lands of like character and approximate value.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire whether it is the purpose of the proponents of this legislation to impress upon the exchanged land the same conditions that were imposed on the original school lands received by the State under the enabling act?

Mr. McCORMICK. I assume that such is the case. There is nothing in this bill that takes the exchanged lands out of the operation of the statute under which the lands were originally set aside.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the funds received from the sale of the timber on the school lands were placed in a trust fund for school purposes for future use?

Mr. McCORMICK. The funds obtained from the sale of the lands under this statute?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; from the sale of the timber.

Mr. McCORMICK. The money obtained from the sale of the timber has been placed in the same fund set aside for the use of schools that arose from the sale of the land itself. The gentleman will understand that Congress has recently enacted legislation enabling the Federal Government to do to its own forest reserves what the State of Montana is asking to do with the lands which it owns.

Mr. STAFFORD. In order to carry out the intention which the gentleman states, has the gentleman any objection to inserting after the word "ownership," in lines 8 and 9, of page 1, the following limitation—which exchanged lands shall be subject to the same requirements and limitations?

Mr. McCORMICK. I have no objection to the insertion of such language.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman one question. I have not a copy of the bill before me. Is this exchange to be made under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, or of a commission, or how? The exchange is to be made, I assume, under the auspices of the forestry department of the government of the State of Montana following such directions as the legislature may impose. The gentleman will understand that all the lands are the property of the State, granted to the State by the Federal Government. The Federal Government will have nothing to do with the actual exchange of land.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. WATSON. What is the acreage of these lands?

Mr. McCORMICK. By the enabling act of February, 1889, the Federal Government set aside for the use of the State of Montana, for educational purposes, sections 16 and 32 in every township in the State not otherwise reserved. Under the operation of this act the State of Montana has in 34 years disposed from time to time of various parts of these lands so set aside.

Mr. WATSON. Is the amount received from the sale of the timber applied for educational purposes for State normal and county schools?

Mr. McCORMICK. For what is known as the common-school system.

Mr. WATSON. And not for State normal schools?

Mr. McCORMICK. Not for the university system or normal schools under this particular feature of the grant. Another section of the same act takes care of the higher school system.

Mr. WATSON. Is the amount received from the sale of timber in a certain township set aside for that particular township?

Mr. McCORMICK. No; it is put into a general trust fund to be administered under the rules laid down by the legislature and does not necessarily, as I understand it, go to any particular township or section of the State.

Mr. WATSON. Has the gentleman information as to the amount of money set aside from the sale of timber?

Mr. McCORMICK. I have no specific information as to the amount that has been set aside up to the present time. Of course, this amount has accumulated under transactions covering 34 years, consequently it would be hard to segregate the amounts received from the sale of timber and the amounts received from the sale of land. I have no specific figures on that point.

Mr. WATSON. Is it the gentleman's idea that the money so set aside has greatly reduced school taxes in Montana?

Mr. McCORMICK. It has aided in that purpose. The gentleman will understand that by the report of the Sage Foundation, I believe made two or three years ago, Montana has been accorded the premier position among the States of the Union for efficiency and general excellence in extending the benefits derived by children from the common-school system. The benefits obtained in this manner have been demonstrated in a manner which excites the admiration not only of the people of the State but of those outside. Of course, it took money or its equivalent to do this.

Mr. WATSON. My object in asking questions along this line is to find out what real benefit the proceeds from the sale of timber has accrued to the interest of public schools.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. OLDFIELD. How is it, if the Federal Government has no jurisdiction, if the State owns all these lands, that you come here with this bill?

Mr. McCORMICK. The enabling act provided that the land should be sold at public auction at a price of not less than $10 an acre. The enabling act did not provide that the State might exchange the land for any other land, and this bill is to enable the State to exchange its lands for other lands, in order to consolidate its forestry interests.

Mr. BLANTON. The United States Government has no interest in these lands?

Mr. McCORMICK. No interest whatever.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a matter wholly for the State of Montana to decide?

Mr. McCORMICK. Absolutely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 1878) to permit the State of Montana to exchange cut-over timberlands granted for educational purposes for other lands of like character and approximate value.

Be it enacted, etc., That tracts of timbered lands heretofore granted to the State of Montana for educational purposes, from which the timber has been cut or removed pursuant to State laws, may, under such rules and regulations as the legislature of said State shall prescribe, be exchanged for other lands of like character and approximately of equal value, in private ownership, to the end that the State may acquire holdings in reasonably compact form and reforestation be undertaken in an economic manner, anything in the enabling act of said State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "ownership," insert "which exchanged land shall be subject to the same requirements and limitations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TOOLE COUNTY IRRIGATION DISTRICT, MONT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3790) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into an agreement with Toole County irrigation district, of Shelby, Mont., and the Cut Bank irrigation district, of Cut Bank, Mont., for the disposal of the waters of Two Medicine, Cut Bank, and Badger Creeks, not needed for domestic or irrigation purposes by the Indians of the Black-foot Indian Reservation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES COAL COMMISSION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13882) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a commission to be known as the United States Coal Commission for the purpose of securing information in connection with questions relative to interstate commerce in coal, and for other purposes," approved September 22, 1922.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object to this bill coming up by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Michigan think that this bill ought to come up by unanimous consent?

Mr. MAPES. I do. It is urgently recommended by the coal commission which was created in September. As the gentleman knows, the life of the commission is very short, and in order to get action it is deemed necessary to have this legislation passed.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] is going to have the floor in about an hour, and we know him well enough to know that whatever is necessary to be passed will be put over.

Mr. MAPES. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts has other legislation which he no doubt will call up when even he has the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is very important, it ought to be more important than a bill that comes up merely under unanimous consent.

Mr. MAPES. Perhaps the gentleman does not understand. Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I understand.

Mr. MAPES. While this bill looks rather formidable, it is largely a reenactment of existing law for the purpose of putting it into sections—

Mr. BLANTON. I think the whole proposition from its inception up to this time has been a farce, so far as reducing the price of coal is concerned or giving coal to a family that is now freezing.

Mr. MAPES. But the commission has not yet made its report. The main feature of this bill and practically the only feature, so far as the new matter is concerned, is to enable the commission to send questionnaires to the 9,000 operators of bituminous mines, require them to answer the questionnaires, verify them, and return the same within the time required by the commission instead of requiring the operators to come here to the District of Columbia to testify in person before the commission. The bill further provides a penalty for making a false statement in filling out the questionnaires, the same as though the witnesses were giving testimony before the commission itself.

Mr. BLANTON. The whole object of the proposition from its beginning was to get coal at a reasonable price.

Mr. MAPES. Oh, no; not this legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. For families.

Mr. MAPES. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. I am referring now to the commission. That was the primary object, and yet we are now suffering in a blizzard.

Mr. MAPES. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about this. This coal commission was created for the purpose of studying the industry and making a report within a year from the time of its creation. It was created September 22, 1922, and, of course, has not had time to make a complete report.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has forgotten what the President said to us from this platform.

Mr. MAPES. There were two pieces of legislation. One of them was the creation of a coal commission and the other was the appointment of a coal administrator, and it was under the administration of the other legislation that it was sought to regulate the price of coal.

Mr. BLANTON. But the two were intimately connected.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; but this has nothing to do with the price for the current year.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has not this coal commission already been sending out these questionnaires in tremendous numbers and in such quantities as to entail, if answered, the employment by the coal concerns of thousands of additional clerks to fill them out?

Mr. MAPES. I can not answer the latter part of the gentleman's question. I will say to the gentleman that the former vice president—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object. There are other bills to come up.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was going to object myself.

ABROGATING CERTAIN AGREEMENTS RESPECTING PANAMA CANAL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate Joint Resolution 259, authorizing the President to abrogate the international agreement embodied in certain Executive orders relating to the Panama Canal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 259) authorizing the President to abrogate the international agreement embodied in certain Executive orders relating to the Panama Canal.

Whereas it is provided in the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, "that all laws, orders, regulations, and ordinances adopted and promulgated in the Canal Zone by order of the President for the government and sanitation of the Canal Zone and the construction of the Panama Canal are hereby ratified and confirmed as valid and binding until Congress shall otherwise provide"; and

Whereas among the orders so ratified and confirmed as valid and binding are Executive orders, issued by the Secretary of War, by direction of the President, on December 3, December 6, and December 28, 1904, January 7, 1905, and January 5, 1911, in which were embodied the terms of an agreement reached between the Secretary of War and officials of the Panama Government to serve as a modus operandi during the construction of the canal; and

Whereas the purpose of the agreement in question has passed with the formal opening of the canal, and the agreement no longer provides an adequate basis for the adjustment of questions arising out of the relations between the Canal Zone authorities and the Government of Panama, and should be replaced by a more permanent agreement:

Resolved, etc., That the President be authorized to abrogate the international agreement embodied in the Executive orders issued as aforesaid, on December 3, December 6, and December 28, 1904, January 7, 1905, and January 5, 1911.

Sec. 2. That when the President shall exercise the authority hereby granted, such orders shall no longer be valid and binding, and the legal effect of these orders given to them by the said act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, shall be repealed.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, this merely represents a technical procedure necessary to enable this Government to work out a treaty with Panama. There is nothing to be said about it more than is said in the resolution itself.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think some criticism may be lodged to the phraseology of the second section. I call the gentleman's attention to the last sentence of section 2—and the legal effect of these orders given to them by the said act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, shall be repealed.

Of course the word "repealed" is the wrong word used there. I think the gentleman will agree with me in that. I can not see any reason for that last clause at all, and as the phraseology is poor I suggest the striking out of that last clause or sentence, because I believe the first portion of the section gives full effect to the idea of the drafter of the resolution—

That when the President shall exercise the authority hereby granted such orders shall no longer be valid and binding.

Mr. WINSLOW. All I can say to the gentleman is that the State Department submitted this as what they wanted, and we felt it was no warrant for us to undertake to change it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think it is good phraseology to provide "that the legal effect shall be repealed"?

Mr. WINSLOW. It does not strike me as being correct, but I would not want to say there was not some sense in the last clause of the section. We might agree upon a substitute for the word "repealed" if it is important.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought it was not the purpose to make nugatory the actions under all of the orders; that what is desired is only to make nugatory the orders as to any future acts. There may be a considerable number of actions pending arising out of these orders. What is desired is to terminate their applicability when a new agreement is entered into. I want to see some legislation passed, but here you terminate action under these orders arising before they are substituted by a new agreement but perhaps not concluded.

Mr. WINSLOW. That is what they said is the necessary thing to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. They want to terminate everything, whether anything is pending or not?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes; they can not ratify the treaty until these orders are abrogated.

Mr. STAFFORD. These orders, as I recall, were issued by the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, to promulgate certain rules of conduct on the Canal Zone, and I thought what was desired was to only terminate them after a new substitute agreement had been entered into.

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman will turn to the letter of transmittal from the President of the United States, I shall ask his attention to the following language:

As soon as the Congress grants the authority to abrogate the existing agreement, it will be possible to proceed with the negotiation which is desired on the part of both the Government of the United States and the Government of Panama.

That would seem to indicate that it could not be done before, and it would seem from the fact that the Senate had passed this bill and had debated it, and from all of the testimony of the State Department which we have in a communication from the Acting Secretary of State, that those who had most to do with it might likely be right as to the modus operandi.

Mr. STAFFORD. Considerable weight should be given to the fact that this was prepared by the State Department. I do not know whether it is prepared by an underling or what position such underling may hold in the State Department, but I am pointing out what perhaps was a difficulty that was not considered by the person drafting the bill. I am not casting any reflection—

Mr. WINSLOW. We had before us the communication from the President of the United States and from the State Department, regardless of who may have drafted the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to refer to the recession of these orders. I do not think we should cancel them so that actions taken under them that are binding and not concluded would be declared nugatory.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is too much for me, I am free to say.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will yield, let us get at what is really intended here. It seems to say that certain Executive orders issued prior to August 24, 1912, by that act certain legal effects were given to these orders. Is that correct?

Mr. WINSLOW. Quite right; that has been referred to.

Mr. TILSON. Certain legal effects which they practically did not have up to that time were conferred upon these orders by the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912. Now, it is the intention to repeal any such legal effects as that act conferred upon those orders, and it seems to me that may be the proper thing.

Mr. WINSLOW. In the communication between the State Department and the President of the Senate it appears—

By the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, these orders, together with all other orders and regulations promulgated in the Canal Zone by order of the President for the government and sanitation of the Canal Zone and construction of the Panama Canal, were ratified and confirmed as valid and binding until Congress should otherwise provide.

I understand the process is this: That whenever existing laws are repealed the State Department is free to go ahead and make a treaty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely, I thoroughly agree that some action should be taken by Congress so as to permit the administration to enter into a new treaty with the Republic of Panama. I am not going to press the suggestion that the word "repealed" is very awkward. It does say legal effect repealed; it would be better to say terminated, or would cease.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think it would be safer to leave it as it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall pardon such State Department underling who uses such bad language. I am not going to press it, as this has passed the scrutiny of a great committee body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. As I recall, we had no hearings on this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. WINSLOW. We had no hearings, and none were called for by the committee.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is my recollection that the explanation made to us was that during the construction of the canal certain ordinances were promulgated by the Executive relating to the control of the canal, and those ordinances have been subsequently ratified by Congress, thus giving them the effect of law. And now that the canal has been completed, those ordinances are no longer applicable, yet the Executive can not change them because the Congress has made them law, and it was desired that they be repealed in order to promulgate ordinances which would be applicable to the present state of affairs.

Mr. WINSLOW. Quite so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman that I have no recollection of anything being said to the committee of its being necessary to get these ordinances out of the way in order to make a treaty with Panama.

Mr. WINSLOW. That clearly was said. The chairman distinctly read the report which we have here from the Senate.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I had in my mind in voting the bill out we were simply freeing the hands of the Executive to deal with present conditions upon the Panama Canal Zone relating solely to the operation of the canal, and that the matter had no international aspect.

Mr. WINSLOW. Quite to the contrary. It was for the purpose of ratifying the treaty with Panama. That sticks out all over the bill and all printed matter in re.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman means the negotiation of a treaty?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. This situation with respect to Panama is somewhat different from the ordinary treaty. There were certain contracts or agreements entered into by the Secretary of War under what was termed "orders" during construction days, and they were in the nature of working contracts or agreements with the Republic of Panama. Now, the act of Congress known as the Panama Canal act gave them the force of a statute or act of Congress by especially referring to the orders, and gave them the force and effect of a law or an act of Congress. Therefore the President can not abrogate them and can not negotiate a new treaty in their place without a specific act of Congress.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What we are really doing in legal effect is to denounce the treaty with Panama.

Mr. WINSLOW. No; we are authorizing the President to do so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Let me suggest that it is unnecessary, as preliminary to the negotiation of a treaty, that we should repeal or take any action with reference to an existing treaty. That all comes within the scope of the new treaty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question, with the consent of the gentleman in charge?

Mr. WINSLOW. Go ahead.

Mr. STAFFORD. Congress having validated these orders of the Secretary of War by a confirmatory act in 1911, that makes them the legislation of Congress, so far as the government of the Canal Zone is concerned. I question very much, in view of the fact of Congress having passed legislation relating to the internal affairs of the Canal Zone, whether a treaty entered into between our Government and the Republic of Panama can supersede these existing enactments of Congress.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that on further reflection the gentleman will not have that doubt, because the Constitution gives treaties equal effect with the laws of the land passed by Congress, and it has been held many times that laws may be repealed by the subsequent ratification of treaties inconsistent with them. There is no doubt about that. We can ratify a treaty with Panama which in a constitutional manner will become the law of the land and supersede and repeal all laws in conflict with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. This relates to what we consider to be almost the sovereignty of the country. It is true, the zone is held under a perpetual lease, but the Hay-Pauncefote treaty gives our Government virtual authority over it.

The very first act that I was called upon to pass upon more than 20 years ago in this House was an act validating the Cuban reciprocity compact entered into between our Government under President Roosevelt and the Republic of Cuba. The pact required a validating act. So far as the law applying to the Isthmus of Panama is concerned, Congress having passed legislation applying to that zone, I question very much whether the negotiation of a treaty would supersede that law over that which we consider as our own dominion.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was entirely satisfied with the explanation given in the committee, but I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will pardon me for saying that I am not satisfied with the explanation given to-day on the floor.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is the same one. Perhaps the gentleman was paying more attention now.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Perhaps I have brightened up from what I was in committee. I will say to the gentleman that I would like some one from the State Department to give me a better explanation of what is to be done than we have yet received.

Mr. WINSLOW. The committee was of opinion that we had received sufficient information.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. From the explanation given in the committee, I understood the bill had no relation to our international relations with Panama. I understood that it applied only to the Canal Zone, which is exclusively under American jurisdiction.

Mr. WINSLOW. It is a pleasure to hear that, because this is the first time the gentleman from Alabama has ever been caught napping in the committee. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

AIR MAIL SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11193) to encourage commercial aviation and authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for air mail service, and prescribing rate of transportation and postage thereon.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I regard this bill as being too important to be considered on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next one.

EXCHANGE OF LAND WITH THE CITY OF BOISE, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12007) providing for the conveyance of certain land to the city of Boise, Idaho, and from the city of Boise, Idaho, to the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to convey by quitclaim deed to the city of Boise, Ada County, Idaho, for enlargement of the State Capitol Park, and for no other purpose, all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to the alley running east and west through block 54, in which is located the post-office site in the said city: Provided, however, That the city shall not have the right to sell and convey the said premises, nor to devote the same to any other purposes than as hereinbefore described, and shall not erect thereon any structures or improvements except such as are incidental to boundaries and ornamentation as part of the State Capitol grounds; and in the event that said premises shall not be used as part of the said State Capitol grounds, and cared for and maintained as such, the right, title, and interest hereby authorized to be conveyed shall revert to the United States: Provided also, That the city of Boise shall convey to the United States for alley purposes, in accordance with a resolution of the city council of Boise, April 25, 1922, a strip of land in said block 54 as now laid out for such purposes, commencing at the northeast intersection of the post-office site (addition) with Jefferson Street; thence with said Jefferson Street, crossing said alley, 20 feet; thence in a southwesterly direction 78 feet 6 inches; thence in a reverse curve, following the curb now in place, to a north lot line of the said post-office site; thence along said lot line, northwesterly, approximately 49 feet to a point; thence northeasterly to the point of beginning.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

STANDARD OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7103) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is too important a bill—

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to withhold the objection for a while.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as the gentleman will remember, was threshed out on the floor of the House and passed by this House by a unanimous vote after a consideration of two days. It was amended and passed, and it went to the Senate and was favorably reported by the Senate committee just two days before the last session of Congress adjourned, and there was not time to pass it in the Senate. It is now presented, amended just as it passed the House before.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have had some regrets in the past that I was not a Member of the last Congress. I may have some regrets later I am not to be a Member of the next Congress. When I am out of Congress in these intermittent periods between the terms of service which it has been my privilege to render here, I do not give any attention whatsoever to the affairs of Congress. I put the animal behind me. I was unaware until the gentleman apprised me of the fact that this bill had been considered in the last Congress and had been passed virtually by both bodies. I thought it was a new proposition. If it had been a new bill, I would have objected. True, this is a new Congress, but the last Congress perhaps might not have been just as good a Congress as this. And yet I am willing to accept the action of that Congress in its determination as to what should be the policy as to the size of the flour bag. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

Mr. BLANTON. If my colleagues are going to take any hope at all out of the gentleman's remarks they must not hope beyond two years, because very likely the gentleman will be back in the Sixty-ninth Congress. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman confines this standardization and the criminal penalties to the sale of original packages of grits, hominy, etc. There is nothing in the bill that would impose any liability upon the farmer or small local miller for selling his own products or the products of his neighbors.

Mr. VESTAL. Not at all.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has covered that point so that there is no doubt about it, has he?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any objection on my part.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How many sections are there in this bill?
Mr. VESTAL. Eight sections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. VESTAL. Unanimously reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the standard of weights for the following wheat-mill products, namely, hominy, grits, and meal, and all commercial feeding stuffs, shall be 100 pounds avoirdupois, and the standard measure for such commodities, when the same are packed for sale, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over, shall be a package containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or a multiple of 100 pounds, or one of the following fractions thereof: 5, 10, 25, or 50 pounds; and, in addition, for wheat flour only, 140 pounds; and for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds; each of which packages shall bear a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement of the net weight contained therein.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the words "wheat-mill" insert the words "and corn-mill."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment: On page 2, line 2, after the word "flour," add the words "and corn flour."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VESTAL: Page 2, line 2, after the word "flour," insert the words "and corn flour."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please elucidate? I may be ignorant. Is that the same thing as what we know as corn meal?

Mr. VESTAL. Corn meal. The exception was made to the 140-pound sack of wheat flour and we want the same exception as to corn flour.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think if the gentleman would say "corn meal" it would be much more universally understood. Down in our section of the country we would not know what was meant by corn flour.

Mr. WINGO. Is not corn flour a violation of the health laws of some States? Corn flour is corn meal, but in some States the State boards of health will not permit corn flour to be sold. They will permit corn meal but not corn flour. I think the gentleman means corn meal—ground corn out of which corn bread is made?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the standard packages for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over, shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or multiples of 100 pounds, or the following fractions thereof: 5, 10, 25, and 50 pounds; and, in addition, for wheat flour only, 140 pounds; and for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, and 80 pounds.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment in line 15, page 2, after the word "flour" insert the words "and corn flour."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VESTAL: Page 2, line 15, after the word "flour" insert "and corn flour."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that this would not apply to the small merchant.

Mr. VESTAL. This applies to the sale in unbroken packages.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Section 2 provides—

That the standard packages for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over, shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or multiples of 100 pounds, or the following fractions thereof: 5, 10, 25, and 50 pounds—

That includes feed, feed stuffs, grits, and meals. A man goes to a small miller, such as we have in pretty nearly all our little country towns, and buys some corn meal or buys some feed for stock to put in sacks. If I understand this act correctly, it is going to be necessary for this miller to weigh his stuff and to mark on the sack what it contains. It must be 100 pounds, 50 pounds, 25 pounds, or some other prescribed weight. If there is any exception to that as regards the size of the business a man does, I have not been able to find it yet. I do not think the committee intended to make it necessary for the little fellow who runs a little business in a country town to have to comply with all these formalities, do you?

Mr. VESTAL. An exception is made of commercial feeding stuffs when they are packed, shipped, or sold or offered for sale in packages, that they shall contain certain weights. That is different from the rest of the bill.

These packages must contain 60, 70, or 80 pounds. This was put in for the purpose of taking care of the farmer who uses corn sacks in going to the mill to buy feed. But the original packages of flour or corn meal must have 100 pounds or a decimal part of 100 pounds. It all comes back to this proposition, that by custom in the United States a barrel of flour contains 196 pounds. We propose that the barrel shall contain 200 pounds instead of 196. It would be all right to have it at 196 pounds if they carried it out when they come down to the subdivision, but some eighths of a barrel will contain only 23½ pounds.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let us concede all that to be true. You go to the mill or the place where they grind their own grist and buy a sack of corn meal or a sack of feed—

Mr. VESTAL. You can buy any amount you desire.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But where do you get it in the bill? Section 3 includes flours, hominy, grits and meals, and commercial feedstuffs, and says it shall be one of the standard measures in section 2. If that does not include the man who sells you a sack of corn meal, I do not know what it does mean.

Mr. VESTAL. You could go in and buy 26 or 18 pounds of corn meal, but if he puts it up in packages he must mark on the packages what those packages contain.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If he sells a sack of feed in the original sack, he must stamp the number of pounds in the package, and it must be of a certain weight.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; but if you come in and ask for 15 or 18 pounds of corn meal, he can break a sack and put in what you ask for and sell you any amount.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think you are entailing a lot of extraordinary work on the little country millers. I am not going to object to it, but I want to call attention to the fact that the little fellows over the country have got to go to a lot of expense and trouble to comply with the conditions of this law.

Mr. VESTAL. I do not believe that is true, because I do not know a single miller or a single jobber or commission merchant that objects to this bill. They all of them want the bill and think it would be for the interest of the people.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think they would be for the bill; but if you ask the little fellows in the little towns, they will not be for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, both the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Indiana have spoken about carrying the corn to the mill, when neither of them ever rode old Beck to the mill to get the corn ground, and how are they going to give us any information?

Mr. VESTAL. I will say that I have.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Illinois. I did not have time to read this bill fully before I found it was coming up, but the gentleman assured me sincerely that he believes the bill would do what he suggests, that it would not interfere along the lines that the gentleman from Illinois has been expressing a fear about. I want to suggest to the gentleman that I think he ought to put in some language like this at the end of line 10, page 3: "Provided, That the sale of irregular, broken lots sold by actual weight shall not be unlawful." I know what the gentleman wants to get hold of; it is the original packages put up in a fancy style, or feed in large shipments that he wants to prevent being sold by short weight. But you do not want to prohibit the small miller, the local merchant, who will grind meal, from selling the product in any quantity at his mill.

Mr. VESTAL. Not at all. That was discussed, and Judge Gard offered an amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Would the gentleman object to this language?—"Provided, That the sale of irregular, broken lots by actual weight shall not be unlawful."

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think it would do any good. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. WINGO. I think it expresses the idea which I had in mind and which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] had in mind.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not want to interfere with the little fellows, and neither do you.

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly not.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly.

Mr. RHODES. Is this the bill which the millers over the country are in favor of?

Mr. VESTAL. This is the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment, and it is better to have it come in at the end of line 10, page 3, which we have passed.

Mr. VESTAL. I have no objection to it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we return to page 3, line 10, in order that I may offer the amendment which I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, at the end of line 10, page 3, by inserting the following proviso:

Provided, That the sale of irregular broken lots by actual weight shall not be unlawful.

Mr. VESTAL. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Wingo: Page 3, line 10, after the word "measure" strike out the period, insert a colon and the following language: "Provided, That the sale of irregular broken lots by actual weight shall not be unlawful."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman mean by "irregular, broken lots"? Of course, we have some concept in our mind as to what that means, but has the law enforcement officer that same thing in mind?

Mr. WINGO. You have to take it in connection with the language with which it is used. The original idea is to standardize these packages, that where they purport to be of certain weight they must be of that weight, and we are trying to regulate commercial packing. The merchant might want to sell a broken package of 7 pounds of corn meal, or the miller might have an odd lot, and he can say to his customer "I will sell you a hundred and odd pounds." The idea was to restrict it to the commercialized packing to be sold in original packages. My idea is to provide for a situation where the housewife wants to buy 7 pounds of meal, say. In that case the merchant may take it out of a barrel or he may break one of these packages and sell it without having to label it, as is provided with these standard-sized containers.

Mr. VESTAL. That is what we tried to do in the bill before, and I thought it had been done.

Mr. STAFFORD. The word "regular" or the word "irregular" did not occur in the bill at all?

Mr. VESTAL. No.

Mr. WINGO. You are trying to reach the regular sale of standardized packages, and the sale of others would be irregular and would be in broken quantities, which the small merchant or miller might want to dispose of.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of making an inquiry. I notice that in the latter part of section 4 it is provided that when these packages are made up for export and it is later determined that it is not desirable to export the commodity, that they may be sold here in the packages in which they were originally packed for export.

Mr. VESTAL. By special contract.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the gentleman anticipate that there might be a good deal of confusion in the local market if he permits that exception?

Mr. VESTAL. No; I do not think so. The fact is that the sale of wheat flour and corn-meal flour to all European countries is in packages of 140 pounds. We have made this exception here of 140 pounds, and we have also made the exception further in section 4 just as the gentleman has mentioned, that when the packages are intended for export they can be placed in different sized packages than those named in the bill. The fact is that they will be put in 140-pound packages. The bakers of the country use 140-pound packages, so that we feel that if they were intended originally for export and then were not sold, that they would probably all be taken by the bakers, anyway, and there would be no confusion about it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the bill authorize the sale of these packages of the size desired by bakers under the general terms of it?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If that is so, why is it necessary to make this exception?

Mr. VESTAL. I really did not think it was necessary, but to some foreign countries, outside of Europe, they sell in different sized packages.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

GRADE OF ENLISTED MEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4037) to amend the grade percentages of enlisted men as described in section 4b of the national defense act, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this may go over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill may retain its place on the calendar and be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PECOS COUNTY, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6423) to detach Pecos County, in the State of Texas, from the Del Rio division of the western judicial district of Texas and attach the same to the El Paso division of the western judicial district of said State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I recall, already in this Congress we arranged to have this county of Pecos made a part of the El Paso division of the western judicial district of Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will state to the gentleman that the bill was passed by both Houses of Congress, but an error was discovered in it and we had to have the President veto it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was wondering whether they changed their minds frequently down there.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Oh, no; they never change their minds down there on the Pecos.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Pecos County, in the State of Texas, be, and the same is hereby, detached from the Del Rio division of the western judicial district of the State of Texas and attached to and made a part of the El Paso division of the western judicial district of said State.

SEC. 2. That all process against persons resident in said county of Pecos and cognizable before the United States district court shall be issued out of and made returnable to said court at Pecos City, and that all prosecutions against persons for offenses committed in said county of Pecos shall be tried in said court at El Paso or Pecos City: Provided, That no civil or criminal cause begun and pending prior to the passage of this act shall be in any way affected by it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Before the redistricting of the State of Texas, at the time I represented the old sixteenth district, it embraced Pecos County, and I then introduced a bill myself to do just exactly what this bill does. Later, the State was redistricted and that splendid county was given to my distinguished colleague [Mr. HUDSPETH] to my loss. Later in this Congress he reintroduced the bill, and on one unanimous-consent day the preamble of the bill led me to believe that it was the bill creating new courts and providing for additional district judges. Inadvertently I objected to its consideration at that time, thinking it was that additional judges' bill.

As soon as I found out that I was in error, I withdrew all opposition, but in the meantime the rule was asked to be suspended. I just wanted to make this statement merely to indicate to these splendid, good people out there in Pecos County, because they are some of the best people in the State of Texas, that I have no opposition whatever to the changing of the district in which their court was held, in view of the fact that the press there indicated opposition from me.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUDSPETH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ALLEGHENY RIVER IN VENANGO COUNTY, PA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13808) granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River in the State of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the commissioners of Venango County, Pa., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Allegheny River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at Oil City, Pa., connecting Petroleum Street, on the south side of the river, with North Petroleum Street, on the north side of the river, in the county of Venango, in the State of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

DRAWLESS BRIDGES ACROSS A CERTAIN PORTION OF CHARLES RIVER, MASS.

The next business in order on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13760) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of drawless bridges across a certain portion of the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts," approved November 14, 1921.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act to authorize the construction of drawless bridges across a certain portion of the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts, approved November 14, 1921, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That the Metropolitan Park Commission, or any town or city, or any other public body authorized by the State of Massachusetts, all or any of them, be, and they hereby are, authorized to construct, at any time hereafter, drawless bridges across the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts, connecting Massachusetts Avenue in Cambridge and Massachusetts Avenue in Boston, and at any other points upon said river at, near, or above said Massachusetts Avenue: Provided, That said bridges shall be at least 12 feet above the ordinary level of the water in the basin over the main ship channel, and the piers and other obstructions to the flow of the river shall be constructed in such form and in such places as the Secretary of War shall approve: Provided further, That before the construction of said bridges, or any of them, is begun, the State of Massachusetts shall, by legislative enactment, provide for adequate compensation to the owner or owners of wharf property used as such on or before the 1st day of January, 1921, situated on said river above any of said bridges, for damages, if any, caused to said property by reason of interference with the access by water thereto enjoyed on the 1st day of January, 1921, and theretofore, because of the construction of said bridge or bridges without a draw: And provided further, That said legislative enactment shall provide that any person or persons entitled to any such damages to property may have the same determined by a jury of the superior court for the county of Suffolk or for the county of Middlesex, in said State of Massachusetts, on petition therefor filed within two years after any of said bridges without a draw causing such damage have been opened to public travel.

"Except as inconsistent herewith, this act shall be subject to the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 15, strike out the words "or above."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill in section 1 by striking out lines 11 to 25, inclusive, on page 2 and the first two lines on page 3.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I promised certain members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that I would offer this amendment when the bill came before the House. It seems that when this bill was heard before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce quite a number of the members of the committee who were not present when the bill, which afterwards became a law, approved November 14, 1921, was before the committee, objected to this damage provision on the ground that none of the other bridge bills reported by the committee had contained any such provision. When I drew the original bill I inserted this damage proviso because I understood that the War Department would require it. It seems that almost 20 years ago, when the first bill was introduced in Congress to provide for the construction of a bridge across the Charles River between the cities of Cambridge and Boston without a draw, it being a new proposition, the War Department objected to granting permission to build any such bridges without a draw as all the bridges on the Charles River at that time had draws. Finally a compromise bill was passed with a provision requiring that before the bridge should be constructed the legislature of Massachusetts must provide by statute for the determination of damages, if any, to the riparian owners.

Now, as a matter of fact, the whole matter was litigated when this first bridge, which is located below this bridge, was constructed without a draw. That bridge was allowed to be constructed without a draw, and the owners or lessees of wharves along the river who considered that they had been damaged had an opportunity to bring their suits in the superior court of either Middlesex or Suffolk County, and the matter was adjudicated. Now it seems that, owing to the fact that Congress has already passed two acts permitting the construction of bridges without a draw, both above and below this proposed bridge, the War Department is no longer interested in having any such condition precedent inserted in this bill. And the War Department being agreeable in order to meet the objections of members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the effect that Congress ought not to go into the question of damages, which is entirely a State matter, any parties who think that they may be damaged having the right under the State law to bring proceedings in the courts of Massachusetts, I agreed to offer this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the authorization providing for the erection of a drawless bridge below the Harvard Bridge, did any of the upper owners of property, utilizing the bridge, as I remember, for some 30 years back, bring damage suits?

Mr. DALLINGER. They did.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did all of them bring damage suits?

Mr. DALLINGER. All had an opportunity to bring them, and they again had the opportunity when the so-called Stadium Bridge bill was passed, which also had a damage clause to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the gentleman's contention is that if any of the upper property owners on the Charles had any claim for damages arising from the closing of the lower bridge they had full reparation under that bill in their claim for damages, and it is not necessary to pass this supplemental enabling provision?

Mr. DALLINGER. Exactly; and even if they have any possible claim for additional damages, they would have their remedy in the Massachusetts courts, regardless of any provision in an act of Congress. Moreover, there are no owners or lessees of land on the banks of the river who, in my opinion, can be affected. Practically all of the land on both sides of the river from Cambridge Bridge, which took the place of the old West Boston Bridge, clear up to Watertown, has either been taken as a public park or is about to be taken.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. These are not drawbridges, as I understand?

Mr. DALLINGER. The bridges in between the Cambridge Bridge and the Stadium Bridge now have draws. As a matter of fact, however, for the last few years the draw on the Harvard Bridge has been seldom opened.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Does not the gentleman think that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the War Department ought to look into the question of doing away with drawbridges throughout the country? I notice in Europe they do not have bridges with draws and smokestacks and crow's nest when you go over a bridge. I do not understand why Congress does not give attention to that.

Mr. DENISON. The War Department has full authority to give attention to that now.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I know the War Department has authority to give attention to that, but the War Department ought to be instructed to look into this question.

Mr. DENISON. They do look into it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. We can certainly amend this bridge act here.

Mr. DENISON. We can not go into details. We give that department authority to look into it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I know; but it seems to me we ought to take it up with the War Department and pass an act of Congress.

Mr. WINSLOW. Let us think it over and do that, some day.

[Laughter.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. It would be well to do it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. There is one drawless below this. What is that?

Mr. DALLINGER. The new Cambridge Bridge, so called, which took the place of the old West Boston Bridge.

Mr. TILSON. Then what is the other?

Mr. DALLINGER. It is the Stadium Bridge or Lars Anderson Bridge, near Harvard University.

Mr. TILSON. This is between the two?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes; about a mile above the first bridge which I mentioned and about 2 miles below the Stadium Bridge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALLINGER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TEXAS & PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 4029) to amend and supplement the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts supplemental thereto, approved, respectively, May 2, 1872, March 3, 1873, and June 22, 1874," with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the powers conferred by the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1871," approved May 2, 1872, the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. shall have power and authority at any time, or from time to time, by resolution of its board of directors, duly adopted at a meeting thereof held in accordance with its by-laws, and with the consent of the holders of a majority in amount of its then outstanding capital stock, expressed by vote in person or by proxy at a special meeting of said stockholders called for the purpose upon such notice as its by-laws require for the calling of such special meeting, to authorize an issue, or issues, of its bonds for the completion, equipment, maintenance, or repair of its lines of railroad, the funding of any debt, the making of any additions, extensions, or betterments to its property, or for any other lawful corporate purpose, without limitation in amount to $40,000 per mile of its lines of railroad as prescribed by said act of Congress approved May 2, 1872, but not in excess of $65,000 per mile, and to secure said bonds, or any of them, by mortgage or other lien upon all or any portion of its franchises and property.

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., heretofore fixed by its board of directors pursuant to the provisions of said act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, at $50,000,000, may be increased at any time, or from time to time, not to exceed in the aggregate $75,000,000, by resolution of its board of directors duly adopted at a meeting thereof held in accordance with its by-laws and with the consent of the holders of a majority in amount of its then outstanding capital stock, expressed by vote in person or by proxy at a meeting of said stockholders called for the purpose upon such notice as its by-laws require for the calling of such special meeting.

Any additional share of capital stock so authorized shall be entitled to such rights, privileges, and priorities and preferences and be subject to such limitations and restrictions as may be determined by resolution of the board of directors with like consent of the holders of majority in amount of the then outstanding capital stock of the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co.: Provided, That each share of outstanding capital stock, preferred or common, shall be entitled to one vote at every stockholders' meeting, which may be voted in person or by written proxy.

SEC. 3. That all power and authority granted by this act, or by any of the aforesaid acts, shall be subject in its exercise to the provisions of the interstate commerce act, or any act amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto from time to time in force.

SEC. 4. That a copy of the resolution of the board of directors and of the stockholders, or of the proceedings at a stockholders' meeting, authorizing any such increase in capital stock, or the issuance of any such bonds, and of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission or other governmental agency authorizing the same, certified by the secretary of the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., shall be filed and recorded in the Department of the Interior, and when so filed shall be sufficient evidence of the power and authority of the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. to issue such additional stock or bonds.

SEC. 5. That the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., for the purposes of all actions at law by or against it, real, personal, or mixed, and all suits in equity, shall be deemed a citizen of the State of Texas and an inhabitant of the county of Dallas, in said State: Provided, That no civil suit in tort brought against said railway company in the State courts of Louisiana or Arkansas may be removed by said railway company to any court of the United States on account of diverse citizenship.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands a second.

Mr. WINSLOW. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has 20 minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as may be discovered from an examination of it, very clearly indicates its purpose. It was first introduced in the Senate. Some days thereafter I introduced it here. I am not as familiar with the facts as my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], a member of the committee conducting the investigation and reporting the bill. I will make this very brief statement. The Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. is operating under a Federal charter. It is now in the hands of receivers. On account of the limitations upon the issuance of stock contained in its charter it finds itself under great difficulty in obtaining the funds necessary to discharge existing obligations and to make the betterments required in order to give the character of service needed in the territory through which it operates. In brief, this bill proposes an increase in the limitation of the stock which may be issued; that increase, however, to be operative only when application has been made to the Interstate Commerce Commission and approval had from that commission. In other words, the purpose of this bill is to give the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. the same opportunity to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and upon proper showing receive permission to execute its obligations and get money which the railroads of the country generally have. This bill is reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, and my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is more familiar with its details than I am. He will continue the explanation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not know how to continue the control of the time on this side. I personally do not desire more time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the opposition kindly use some time?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I will have more than one speech on this side. It occurs to me that it is nothing but fair that the proponents of the bill discuss it more at length than has been done.

Mr. WINSLOW. Perhaps the gentleman had better use some of his time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If that is the gentleman's idea of what is fair, I will take my time.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama is going to conclude in one speech, the Chair thinks those in favor of the bill ought to use a little more time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, so far as the chairman of the committee knows there is but one more speech on this side.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, a rather extraordinary situation is presented here. Those who propose this bill seem to think it ought to be accepted by a two-thirds vote of the House without any explanation of what it is about. By saying that I do not mean to disparage what has been said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. But manifestly a bill that requires debate at all can not have justice done to it by any Member, no matter how capable and no matter what his qualifications may be, by a mere perfunctory one or two minutes' talk about it.

I think these gentlemen ought to show their cards, lay them on the table, and let the Members of the House see what sort of a case they have got. They come in here and ask us to pass this bill. Why should we pass it? It seems that they do not dare tell you why you should pass it. If the bill is so meritorious that it speaks for itself and requires no advocacy, why do they reserve all their time for debate to answer anything that I may say? Surely nothing that I could say would affect a bill having such manifest merits as this measure has, as the attitude of these gentlemen would imply.

This is a bill to amend the charter of the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. As the opponent of the bill, I am forced to take up the few minutes allotted to me in telling you what it is, since the proponents of the bill have failed to do so. It proposes to amend the charter in three respects—to increase the amount of the bonded indebtedness per mile, which it is authorized under the law to have; to increase its capital stock to $75,000,000; and, third, to take away the jurisdiction which the courts of Arkansas and Louisiana now rightfully have over this corporation.

The bill, as was originally reported by the committee, proposed to allow this corporation to remove suits of all kinds into the Federal court because of diverse citizenship. By a change it is now in such form as to allow it to remove only suits on contract, suits ex contractu as distinguished from suits in tort. As far as suits in tort are concerned the State courts are to be left with the jurisdiction they now have, but so far as other suits are concerned the jurisdiction of the State courts of Louisiana and Arkansas is to be taken away by this measure.

As this railroad company now stands it holds a Federal charter and is therefore a Federal corporation. As such it has no local situs and is not a citizen of any State. It may be sued in any State in which it does business and where service may be obtained. The courts of any State by service of process may compel the corporation to respond just as any corporation of that State would be. But by this measure it is proposed to make this corporation a citizen of the State of Texas, so the courts of Louisiana and Arkansas will no longer have the jurisdiction which they now have, but that jurisdiction over contract suits may be taken into the Federal court because of diverse citizenship. That is the cool proposal that is being submitted to the Congress of the United States—it is submitted to the Representatives of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas.

Whether they will approve it or not is their responsibility and not mine. I feel it my duty to point out to them exactly what they are doing, so that there will be no misunderstanding about it, no plea of infancy put in when their constituents bring suit against this railroad corporation and the case is taken out of the State court, where it might heretofore have been tried, and removed for trial to some distant place, to a Federal court, and the constituents put to great inconvenience in asserting their rights against the corporation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does this bill affect the jurisdictional amount at all?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; where the amount is sufficient and a suit arising out of a contract is brought against the railroad the case can be removed to a Federal court on account of diverse citizenship if the suit is brought in Arkansas or Louisiana. That is what is proposed by the bill. It can not be done now. Your States of Arkansas and Louisiana are good enough for the railroad to do business in. Your constituents are good enough for it to derive its profits from, your peace officers are good enough to give it the protection of your laws, but your courts are too low in standing and you are too lax in the administration of justice for this corporation to trust when it comes to suits on matters of contract.

Of course, I realize that it is a mere matter of necessity which induces the gentlemen who are pushing this bill to agree that even the tort suits may be left in the State courts. They are afraid that otherwise they can not get by with it. They caused it to be reported out of the committee in such a form that all forms of action could be removed, but now they are backing up on tort suits. They think perhaps that the Representatives of Arkansas and Louisiana are mere damage-suit lawyers and will have no interest in suits on contracts, and so they can get by with it. I wonder if they can. I wonder if the spirit of fairness of the House will allow them to get by.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. WINGO. Section 5 of the original bill provides:

That the Texas & Pacific Railway Co., for the purposes of all actions at law by or against it, real, personal, or mixed, and all suits in equity, shall be deemed a citizen of the State of Texas and an inhabitant of the county of Dallas, in said State.

Now, not only Texas is its legal citizenship but the habitat of the corporation is in one particular county. Did the committee discuss the possible legal effect of this restriction?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. All the hearings we held on this bill was a speech by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], about as short as the one he made to-day, and the speech of the attorney for the receivers of the railroad company. We have had no real hearing on the bill; no adverse interests were heard.

Mr. WINGO. What is the gentleman's idea about the effect of not only making the corporation a citizen of the State of Texas but saying that it shall be an inhabitant of one particular county in Texas? What is the legal effect in case a suit should be brought in Miller County, Ark., and asked to be removed to the Federal court? Or suppose you wanted to bring a suit in Texas, could you bring it in Bowie County, Tex., or would you have to go to the Federal court in Dallas?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That depends wholly on the laws of the State of Texas; I do not know—I say that frankly.

Let me get back to the principle that is back of my opposition to this bill. I would have trusted the Louisiana and Texas Representatives to see this point about the removal of suits without any reminder from me, but this bill involves a very important matter of principle that I want to present to the Members of the House.

In the seventies there was a great fever to develop the West. There was a great era of railroad building, much of it done out of the Public Treasury and at the public expense. Gentlemen are familiar with the history of that period of speculation, of promotion, and I might almost say of looting the public. Charters to numerous transcontinental systems of railroads were granted by the Congress, vast land grants were made, and various other subsidies granted. The credit mobilier is remembered and many other features that marked that period of extreme laxity in the protection of the public interest.

The Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. was one of the railroads that was chartered at that time. All the other railroads have gone under. They have been reorganized under State charters. Of all the railroads that had Federal charters granted during that period, the Texas & Pacific remains as the sole reminder. It is the last of that crop. It is the last rose of summer, left blooming alone. All her lovely companions redolent with the odor of the looting of the Public Treasury and the robbing of the Nation of a vast domain of public lands are "faded and gone." And this particular corporation has heretofore had occasion to have "faded and gone." These corporations were chartered largely on wind and water. They were built to "promote" railroads, not to build and operate them. They soon went into bankruptcy.

The Texas & Pacific is not an exception. It went into bankruptcy years ago, but those in control were able to carry on a voluntary reorganization among the stockholders by reductions, and so forth, not necessary for me to relate, and so, to hang on to their Federal charter, instead of taking the course of the other transcontinental lines, and taking State charters and taking a clean bill of health.

The Texas & Pacific is now again in bankruptcy. For four years it has been in the hands of a receiver. A receiver now represents it, and his attorney was the only one who made any argument for this bill before the committee. Why should it not take the course which the other railroads which had Federal charters took? Why should it not be reorganized under the laws of some State, just as the others were? I say to you that I have examined the facts touching this railroad carefully, and that there is no good reason why it should not.

I wanted the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to get up and tell you some reasons why this railroad could not reorganize in Texas or in the other States it traverses, just the same as the other railroads have done, but you see what he does. He "drops the pigeon" on me, makes a blind opening, and I am compelled to state his reasons and then to answer them, and give him the opportunity to close. That is fair, or the gentleman would not have taken that course.

They say that a railroad can not be organized under the laws of Texas and operate in another State, and that railroads chartered under the laws of other States can not operate in Texas, and, therefore, they must have a Federal charter. It just so happens that this is not the only railroad that operates in Texas. They have not less than a dozen interstate lines operating in Texas. What do these other railroads do? They get charters under the laws of the adjoining State down to the Texas line, and charters under Texas laws, so far as the road goes, in the State of Texas. The Southern Pacific, the International & Great Northern, all the numerous other railroads that operate in Texas are carried on under that system. Why should not this road do the same? Simply because it does not suit their convenience quite as well as to hold a Federal charter.

The statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] that they wish merely to be put on an equality with the other railroads operating in Texas represents to my mind a very gross misapprehension of the situation. No; the reason you want a Federal charter for the Texas & Pacific is to give it an advantage over the other railroads that operate in Texas. You do not want the Texas & Pacific to be put on an equal footing with the other railroads of Texas. That is exactly what is endeavored to be prevented by this bill. They do not want to reorganize and operate their lines in Texas under a Texas charter and their lines in Louisiana or Arkansas under a Louisiana or Arkansas charter. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

It is just a little more convenient for them not to do it, and that is the purpose of this interference with the jurisdiction of the courts of Louisiana and Arkansas. They want to carry on foreclosure proceedings. Oh, great banking interests can do pretty well whatever they want to in this country. The great banking house of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. is the financial interest back of this railroad. They want to reorganize the railroad to suit themselves, and they want to foreclose their mortgages on it. They are the plaintiff and the defendant, they are the receiver, and I had almost said the judge, and often in these cases it does actually seem as though the bondholders were the judge, too. These financiers want to reorganize and to fix it so that no contract creditor can bring them into court in Louisiana or Arkansas, and that is why you are passing this bill. They want to fix it so that they can control the jurisdiction of the courts. That is why the Texas & Pacific is to be a citizen of Texas and an inhabitant of Dallas County. That is all there is to that feature. It is a little more convenient for these financial interests that preside from afar over the destinies of these great lines of transportation. It is a little more to their interest to have this with a Federal charter than to have the railroad under the two charters operating just as the other railroads of Texas are.

I would not vote to clothe any private corporation with a Federal charter, particularly any railroad corporation, by an act of Congress, and I will not vote to amend any charter. If I would not vote to grant a charter, I would not vote to amend a charter which has heretofore been improvidently granted. If an error was made in the seventies, there is no reason why 1923 should follow up that error, validate it, and make it good and give it out to the world as a proper course of procedure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts grant me five minutes?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have every desire to do so, but I would stultify myself if I were to do it, for the reason that I stated plainly to the Speaker and to the House that I would have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think it would be breaking faith with the House, for I am against the bill. It affects my district, and takes away the jurisdiction of the courts of my district. I knew nothing about that feature of it until it came up here on the floor of the House.

Mr. WINSLOW. I should think that those in charge of time against the bill would yield time to those who are opposed to it. My particular obligation is to those in favor of it. I feel that I shall have to keep my agreement with the House, and I yield the time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, to those of you who have not served on a committee with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] and who have not heard this speech many times before, as those of us who have served with him, it may impress you just a bit for a moment, but when the cold facts of this situation are placed before you I am certain that practically every Member of the House of Representatives will be, as was every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce except the gentleman from Alabama, in favor of this bill. The gentleman from Alabama is a bit amusing. First, you find him on one side of the question of Government ownership of railroads arguing that the Government should take over all railroads and federally charter all of them, and then, when occasion arises and when it will serve its purpose best, he comes before you and says there should not be one railroad in the United States federally chartered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not ask the gentleman to yield, but I will yield to him once.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is undertaking to state my position and he will certainly yield to allow me to say he is incorrect. Does not the gentleman recognize the difference between a charter conferred upon a corporation by act of Congress and a private business, profit-making corporation? The gentleman does not report me for consistency.

Mr. RAYBURN. Even I understand it. The Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. was chartered in 1871 by act of Congress. It is the only Federal chartered railroad now operating in the United States. At that time Congress said that this railroad could issue securities up to $40,000 per mile, and its full capitalization should be $50,000,000 and no more. We find now that all the other railroads of the country have the right to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission and make application for new issues of securities.

If they go there, and if that commission thinks it is for a proper purpose, and it is within their corporate powers, they grant them that authority. The Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. does not have that power or authority simply because it was held down by the charter, and the reason why the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co. has to come here to-day is that this is the only place where that authority can be granted to it. Now, I think there are five Members of the Texas delegation who ride upon the Texas & Pacific Railroad to-day. This railroad is in the hands of a receiver; it is practically bankrupt. We have poor service. If there is any objection on the part of anybody in Texas to-day I do not know it, or if in Louisiana I do not know it, or if in Arkansas until it developed under the speech of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to the gentleman the reason there was no objection from me was because I was told by a gentleman, who I thought was telling the truth about the bill, that all it did was to give the railroad the same rights before the Interstate Commerce Commission as to stock issues as any other railroads. I asked him if it affected any interests in Arkansas. He said "No," and the fact is he deliberately failed to give the information about the jurisdiction in the local courts, and it would naturally make me afraid about trusting the judgment of gentlemen—

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope the gentleman will not say that I misrepresented the facts to him.

Mr. WINGO. No; the gentleman did not.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and I am going to offer an amendment right here to protect the State of Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. The amendment is only in reference to torts.

Mr. RAYBURN. The only reason in the world why this railroad desires a residence somewhere is that there is not a railroad in the United States that does not have a residence except this one. These people are going to be sued upon their bond. They want somewhere to go to be sued. Seven-eighths of the mileage of this railroad is practically in the State of Texas. Their principal offices are there now. When they come to be sued, when they go into this and try to clear it up and reorganize, they do not want to be sued in three States; and I think I may assure the gentleman, after having talked with the people who are interested in this matter, that the only cases that this railroad expect to take into the Federal court, all damage suits and suits in tort, are going to be either in the State courts of Arkansas and Louisiana or—

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is a very good lawyer and for whom I have very great respect. If he is right on one proposition it will relieve me greatly. He said, in order to be fair, they did not want to be sued in three courts. The gentleman does not mean to say if the Federal court of Texarkana, Ark., assumes jurisdiction in such a suit for one purpose, it will not have jurisdiction for all purposes, to the exclusion of the State courts of Arkansas and Louisiana and the Federal court at Dallas. Now, if you adopt this amendment, is it intended to give the Federal court of the Dallas district exclusive jurisdiction, excluding the State courts of Louisiana, Texas, and the Federal court of Arkansas? There is no force to the gentleman's argument if it is not true.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, I do not say this company could not be sued in the Federal court except the Federal court of Dallas, not at all, and I never intended to make such a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the giving to these corporations a residence is a benefit to every attorney who wants to bring a suit against the railroad at any time he wants to bring that suit, and it is a benefit that they have not had before?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is right, and under the laws of the State of Texas this railroad as a corporation can be sued in any gentleman's State, in any State where they can get service upon it, wherever it has an office, and it is just like any other corporation. These people have the right to come to Congress when it does not cost the Federal Government a cent—and this does not cost the Federal Government a cent—and ask that they may be given the paltry authority to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission, like any other railroad, and ask, "May we not increase our indebtedness?" Every dollar of money they may receive from a new issue of securities will go into betterments and improvements, and will benefit every man who rides upon this road, and will benefit every man who works upon this road. It will not be used for exploiting.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] talks about this being a Federal chartered railroad. There is no one in this country who despises a Federal charter more than I do, but these people have a Federal charter and they are not going to surrender it. The people in my home town of Bonham and the people in Clarksville, the home town of my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and the people of Abilene and the people of Dallas have a right to have that railroad put in proper condition for operation. They can not do it until this railroad gets money from somewhere to fix up its line and improve its equipment. This railroad runs through the town I live in.

Until last fall in that whole territory there never was a special car on that railroad. You would have to fight for seats, and the track has been so rough all these years simply because they have not had enough money to spend upon the roadbed and the track to improve it. Over that whole stretch of 243 miles you could not read a newspaper while riding on one of those trains because the riding was so rough. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. How many more railroads are there like that in Texas? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the only one of that kind. This bill simply grants that railroad the power to come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and apply for permission to issue securities of $40,000 per mile of its line of railroad. The book valuation of this railroad is $130,000,000, and the tentative valuation given by the Interstate Commerce Commission is held at $90,000,000. Yet this railroad is held down to $40,000 a mile.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. This does not affect the institution of suits for damages against the railroad heretofore?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all. The House may take my assurance that the whole Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce believe as I do about it, that this railroad ought to have the right, as other railroads in the country have, to come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask for the right to issue securities in order to have something to invest in equipment, betterments, and improvements.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Of course, the gentleman knows, as I understood it at the beginning, that I should be very glad, indeed, to take his side of the question, but I would like to ask him as to section 5. Do you understand that to mean that in the case of a suit on a contract you must go to Dallas to get service?

Mr. RAYBURN. On a contract?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I rather think that is the case.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. And why should that great benefit be given to a railroad with hundreds of miles of track and hundreds of agents that might be served? I am serious about it; I am not trying to find fault.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman did not mean to say that because the habitat or the home of the road happens to be fixed at one place, it could be sued only there?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I did not mean that.

Mr. DENISON. You can sue this railroad anywhere you can get service?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but where can you get service on it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The question of service is a question that is settled by the laws of the States in which the roads are operated. The courts of Arkansas will have just the same jurisdiction as they had before. The question of residence has nothing to do with the question of where you can bring suit.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. What is the purpose, then?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Every other railroad corporation in the country has a residence except this one. By this bill they can get the advantage of the proposition of diverse citizenship and have cases transferred to the Federal court when the proper occasion arises under the United States statutes—a right that every other railroad has. For instance, if a railroad in Indiana sues an Illinois corporation in an Illinois court, that Illinois court can transfer the cause to the Federal court. This one can not do it. It has not the same right that other railroads have.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Is not this the fact, that you are going to give the corporation the right to take rights of way and then take that jurisdiction from the State court and try the issue out in the Federal court?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I think I have a very lively recollection that the State of Arkansas had some difficulty on this question of a foreign corporation designating an agent.

There is a clear distinction between the authority of the State legislature to determine how service may be obtained upon a corporation organized by another State and upon a Federal corporation, unless in the grant of the charter itself we give the State such a right, and you do not in this case. I fear they will run up against a decision that will make every man who wants to sue upon a contract in the city of Texarkana go to Dallas to get service and bring his suit.

Mr. RAYBURN. In what sort of a suit?

Mr. WINGO. In a suit on a contract in a civil action. Under this provision here it is very doubtful whether he might not find himself out of court at the end of the litigation on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction and that he would have to go to Dallas to get service and find a court that had jurisdiction to try the case. Certainly he would have to go to Texas. I think the gentleman will agree to that. Certainly you do that by giving Texas citizenship and by giving a habitat as one particular county.

Mr. RAYBURN. What would be the use of giving them Texas citizenship unless you allowed them to go elsewhere for a residence? Their residence has got to be somewhere.

Mr. WINGO. What do your Texas statutes provide on that?

Mr. RAYBURN. They choose their residence, upon which their charter is granted, but they may be sued anywhere that service is had.

Mr. WINGO. Why do not you put in here a provision like that which is customary in most of the State statutes—that service may be had upon certain designated officials and employees? Your State statute and mine cover the question of service.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the Legislature of Arkansas will amend its statute so that it will contain a provision like that in the Texas statute, you can get service on them anywhere.

Mr. WINGO. The Legislature of Arkansas can not provide how you shall get service on a corporation that has its charter from Congress. Congress alone can fix that.

Mr. RAYBURN. The State court has jurisdiction wherever it can find them.

Mr. WINGO. I fear the Supreme Court of the United States will hold that they can be reached only at the place where they have their legal situs.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will allow me, there is no corporation charter which determines where that corporation can be sued. There it not one such in the United States. The Illinois Central, which is a resident of the State of Illinois, runs down through Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and it can be sued in any one of those States.

Mr. WINGO. I am familiar with that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. While the Illinois Central is a resident of the State of Illinois, it can be sued in those other States, and this act simply makes this Texas & Pacific Railroad a resident of the State of Texas.

Mr. WINGO. Yes, but the Illinois Central Railroad has a charter from the State of Kentucky.

Mr. DENISON. No, it has not. It has a charter from the State of Illinois, but it runs through Kentucky, Tennessee, and the States south.

Mr. WINGO. The point I am trying to bring home to the gentleman is that there is a distinction between a corporation that has a grant of power from the Federal Government and a corporation which gets its charter from a State. If you did not undertake to cover this question, then it might leave jurisdiction in the State; but when you attempt not only to fix its citizenship but its local habitat, under the well known rule you exclude others, and you may not be able to get service upon a local agent; and I doubt whether a State authority would have the power to hold that service on a station agent at a little country station would be legal service, like it would be on the Missouri Pacific or any other company that had its charter under State authority.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the gentleman is entirely incorrect about that, because I know in the State of Texas no question like that ever arises.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that to-day a man may live in the District of Columbia, but if he goes up into Pennsylvania and they get service on him there he can be sued there, and that a corporation having its habitat in Washington can be brought into the court of a State into which its line runs, in accordance with the State law?

Mr. WINGO. When it is incorporated under a State charter.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the way we do in Texas. I do not know how they do in Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. If it was incorporated under a State charter, it would be a different thing.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Winslow] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 16.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Obviously there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. As many as are in favor of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed will vote "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 180, nays 61, answered "present" 2, not voting 184, as follows:

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13696, the independent offices appropriation bill, insist on the disagreement to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13696, the independent offices appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. WASON, Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and Mr. GRIFFIN.

RETURN OF AMERICAN TROOPS FROM GERMANY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 36.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 36.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 5, 1923.

Whereas the United States transport St. Mihiel is expected to arrive at Savannah, Ga., on or about February 7, 1923, with the last contingent of American troops from Germany: Therefore be it Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of five Senators to be designated by the President of the Senate and five Members of the House of Representatives to be designated by the Speaker is authorized to represent the Congress at Savannah, Ga., at such ceremonies as may be determined to be proper and appropriate. One-half of the expense of such committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. REECE, Mr. LINDBERGER, Mr. CONNALLY of Texas, and Mr. BULWINKLE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

REPEAL OF SECTION 3480, REVISED STATUTES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 1016, an act to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I recall that when the original act went through the House, I believe unanimously, it applied only to those who had served in the Civil War against the Confederate forces, as far as the Army was concerned. Now, as I understand, this does not affect in any way the longevity claim that former graduates of the Naval Academy might have against the Government.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; not as I understand it. It puts the Marine Corps and the Navy on the same basis with the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. The reason I asked the question is that there was reported from the committee very early in Congress the bill to validate claims of Army officers so as to give them credit for the time they served at the Military Academy as a basis for longevity claims. There have been some gentlemen on this side, notably the gentleman from Massachusetts, Judge WALSH, who bitterly opposed that legislation. I do not understand that this bill in any way extends the principle in the matter referred to, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will notice that this is a Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but sometimes Senate bills need correction.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I had nothing to do with the preparation of the bill. My duty was to report it at the direction of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," approved July 6, 1914, be amended by adding after the word "Army" the words "Navy, and Marine Corps."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER AT HOOD RIVER, OREG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4341) granting the consent of Congress to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co., and its successors, to construct a toll bridge across the Columbia River at or near the city of Hood River, Oreg.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under reservation of objection, I wish to have some explanation of the grant of this valuable franchise to a private corporation.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman speaks about a private corporation. While the corporation named here is, in a legal sense, private, it is really organized for public community purposes. The people at Hood River, on the Oregon side of the river, and the people at White Salmon, on the Washington side, desire to construct this bridge. They are going out among the citizens of the two States and they are subscribing stock to the corporation in order to secure enough money to build this bridge. It is not a private corporation at all when you consider the public purpose of this bridge. It is really a community affair between the people living on the Washington side and the people living on the Oregon side. They are behind this corporation and bridge.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there are not going to be any tolls charged?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, I think they will have to charge tolls. The bridge will cost something like $500,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the city of Hood River, Oreg., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "toll."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co., and its successors, to construct a bridge across the Columbia River at or near the city of Hood River, Oreg."

BRIDGE ACROSS FOX RIVER, ILL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13616) granting the consent of Congress to the highway commissioner of the town of Elgin, Kane County, Ill., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Fox River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 4353, now on the Speaker's desk, be substituted for this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the highway commissioner of the town of Elgin, situated in the county of Kane and State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Fox River in substantially a direct line, connecting Mill Street on the east side of the river with Spring Street on the west side of the river, in accordance with the provision of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1908.

Sec. 2. That said highway commissioner of the town of Elgin be, and is hereby, further authorized and empowered to construct all necessary abutments, piers, and other structures for the accomplishment of this end.

Sec. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill H. R. 13616, a similar House bill, was laid on the table.

SALARIES OF SENATORS APPOINTED TO FILL VACANCIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate Joint Resolution 248, to provide for the payment of salaries of Senators appointed to fill vacancies, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the salaries of Senators appointed to fill vacancies in the Senate shall commence on the day of their appointment and continue until their successors are elected and qualified; and salaries of Senators elected to fill vacancies in the Senate shall commence on the day they qualify.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "qualify," insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That where no appointments have been made to fill such vacancies the salaries of Senators elected to fill such vacancies shall commence on the day following their election."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14000) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, to transfer and convey to the State of Minnesota all lands, with the buildings thereon, now constituting the White Earth Agency, and school reserves.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill was included in the omnibus Indian bill which was passed on Saturday last, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be stricken from the calendar and be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be stricken from the calendar and laid on the table.

There was no objection.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, ARKANSAS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13571) to amend section 71 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, let the bill be first reported. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 71 of the Judicial Code, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 71. (a) The State of Arkansas is divided into two districts, to be known as the western and eastern districts of Arkansas.

"(b) The western district shall include three divisions, constituted as follows: The Texarkana division, which shall include the territory embraced on July 1, 1920, in the counties of Sevier, Howard, Little River, Pike, Hempstead, Miller, Lafayette, Columbia, Nevada, Ouachita, Union, and Calhoun; the Fort Smith division, which shall include the territory embraced on such date in the counties of Polk, Scott, Logan, Sebastian, Franklin, Crawford, Washington, Benton, and Johnson; and the Harrison division, which shall include the territory embraced on such date in the counties of Baxter, Boone, Carroll, Madison, Marion, Newton, and Searcy.

"(f) Terms of the district court for the eastern division shall be held at Helena on the second Monday in March and the first Monday in October; for the northern division, at Batesville on the fourth Monday in May and the second Monday in December; for the Jonesboro division, at Jonesboro on the first Monday in May and the fourth Monday in November; and for the western division, at Little Rock on the first Monday in April and the third Monday in October.

"(g) The clerk of the court for the eastern district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Helena, Batesville, Jonesboro, and Little Rock. Such offices shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

Sec. 2. The following acts are hereby repealed:

(a) The act entitled "An act to fix the time for holding the term of the district court in the Jonesboro division of the eastern district of Arkansas," approved September 9, 1914; and

(b) The act entitled "An act to transfer certain counties in the several judicial districts in the State of Arkansas," approved March 4, 1915.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDING CRIMINAL CODE RELATING TO OBSTRUCTION OF PROCESS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13993) to amend section 140 of the Criminal Code of the United States, relating to obstruction of process and assaulting officers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 140 of the Criminal Code of the United States be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 140. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States, or other person duly authorized, in serving, or attempting to serve or execute, any mesne process or warrant, or any rule or order, or any other legal or judicial writ or process of any court of the United States, or United States commissioner, or shall assault, beat, or wound any officer or other person duly authorized, knowing him to be such officer, or other person so duly authorized, in serving or executing any such writ, rule, order, process, warrant, or other legal or judicial writ or process, shall be fined not more than $300 and imprisoned not more than one year; and whoever, in committing, or attempting to commit, any of the offenses in this section above described, kills any person, is guilty of murder, and shall be punished as provided in section 275 of the Criminal Code of the United States."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that the bill undertakes to define a certain offense as murder. Is that not now determined by the law of the State?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a State law upon it, but there is no Federal law. The fore part of the section makes it a crime to assault an officer, but under the present Federal law, if the officer be killed, then the Federal court has no jurisdiction, and so the amendment consists of adding the words—and whoever, in committing or attempting to commit any of the offenses in this section above described, kills any person, is guilty of murder.

This has been recommended by the former Attorney General and also by the present Attorney General, and what prompted me in introducing the bill was the fact that within this past month two Federal officers in my home town were assaulted in the performance of their official duties and were nearly murdered; and that was brought to my attention by the United States marshal there. It is recommended, as I say, by the present Attorney General in his last report, and I understand this amendment was recommended by the former Attorney General.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman—it seems to be a pretty far-reaching bill—is it a unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes, sir; it is a unanimous report. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask a question, unless the gentleman from Maryland desires the floor?

Mr. HILL. I simply want to ask a question about the attempt to murder. There is no Federal murder law—

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. I would like to examine the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. While the gentleman is looking at the bill I want to ask a question. The gentleman from South Dakota does not mean that the things he has stipulated in this bill in his State would constitute murder, does he? The mere killing of an officer of itself in no case constitutes murder. There must be other ingredients of the offense, expressed or implied. Why, it would be an infamous proposition for the Federal Government to say by an act of Congress that the mere killing of a Federal officer, regardless of the facts or circumstances, would constitute murder.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Resisting and killing him in the execution of his duties.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose a Federal officer should come to the door of some citizen in the gentleman's State, who might be absolutely unknown to the owner of that Dakota home, and in an abrupt and arbitrary manner would attempt to serve process under such an insulting demeanor as to create such a passion as would provoke an unpremeditated assault and death might ensue? It would not be murder in the gentleman's State or in any other State in the land. It would be some other degree of culpable homicide.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The bill does not say so. It says, "knowingly."

Mr. BLANTON. Knowingly, of course. He might knowingly shoot a man, and yet it might not be murder. It might be culpable homicide of some lesser degree.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. "Knowingly and willfully."

Mr. BLANTON. To be murder it not only requires that the homicide shall be knowingly and willfully committed, but malice is one of the main ingredients of murder. There must be a premeditated killing. There must not be merely a hurried killing in the heat of passion, but it must be premeditated with malice to constitute murder in any State in this land.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. There are degrees of murder, and these are already defined by law.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, but even the second degree of murder requires premeditation, and malice is implied. The main difference between murder in the first and second degree is that in murder of the first degree there is evidence of premeditation and a formed intention to kill beforehand.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The degrees of murder are defined already—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want a Federal law of that kind passed to make every ordinary homicide of a Federal officer murder, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

SHASTA NATIONAL FOREST, CALIF.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 226) authorizing the acceptance of title to certain land within the Shasta National Forest, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept, on behalf of the United States, and without expense to the United States, except for recording deed and for taxes for the current year, from Mary Burt Brittan, of San Francisco, Calif., a gift of certain land described as lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, section 18, township 39 north, range 4 west, Mount Diablo meridian, and the northeast quarter of section 24, township 39 north, range 5 west, Mount Diablo meridian, conveyed by deed dated July 4, 1922: Provided, That said lands shall thereupon become a part of the Shasta National Forest and subject to all laws relating thereto except the mineral-land laws.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay the expense of recording of the deed and taxes for the current year from the appropriation made for general expenses of the Forest Service.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider—

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

SALE OF MONTREAL RIVER LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13032) to authorize the sale of the Montreal River Lighthouse Reservation, Mich., to the Gogebic County Board of the American Legion, Bessemer, Mich.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is a Private Calendar bill and should be transferred to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not looked into the bill and does not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, that will keep it on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. That will keep it on the calendar.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I ask unanimous consent that the bill relating to the Coal Commission (H. R. 13882), which was objected to, may keep its place on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill relating to the Coal Commission, to which objection was made, shall keep its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3702) providing for the acquirement by the United States of privately owned lands situated within certain townships in the Lincoln National Forest, in the State of New Mexico, by exchanging therefor lands on the public domain, also within such State.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands wherein the general law authorizing the exchange of lands in public forests would not apply to the case provided in this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. The general law relating to national forests requires the exchanges to be within the forests. This permits lands inside of the national forests privately owned to be exchanged for lands outside, so that there will be left no privately owned land within the forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the owner or owners of any privately owned lands, situated within township 18 south, range 11 east, or townships 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 south, range 12 east, New Mexico principal meridian, within the county of Otero and State of New Mexico, and within the present boundaries of the Lincoln National Forest, shall submit to the Secretary of Agriculture a proposal for the exchange of said lands for lands upon the public domain situated in the county of Otero and State of New Mexico, and such Secretary shall be of opinion that the acquirement of the same by the United States for national forest purposes would be beneficial thereto, he is hereby authorized and empowered to transmit to the Secretary of the Interior such offer so made to him, together with such recommendations as he may see proper to make in connection therewith, together with a description of the property included in such offer and an estimate of the commercial or other value thereof, intrinsically or otherwise; and if he shall recommend the acquirement of the same by the United States under the provisions hereof, then, and in such event, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered in his discretion to enter into and conclude negotiations with such owner or owners thereof and in exchange for such designated privately owned lands, and upon conveyance by the owner or owners thereof to the United States by a good and sufficient deed, to cause to be patented to such owner or owners such acreage of non-mineral, nonirrigable grazing lands not suitable for agricultural purposes except for raising grass, situated within the said county of Otero, State of New Mexico, of equal total value, as near as he may be able to determine, to the lands so conveyed to the United States.

SEC. 2. That any lands, conveyed to the United States under the provisions of this act shall, upon acceptance of the conveyance thereof, become and be a part of such Lincoln National Forest.

SEC. 3. That before any exchange of lands as above provided is effected, notice of such exchange proposal, describing the lands involved therein, shall be published once each week for four consecutive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county in which such lands so to be conveyed to the United States are situated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—VISÉ FEES OF ALIENS TEMPORARILY VISITING THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 547).

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State recommending that Congress confer upon the President authority to modify visé fees and requirements applicable to aliens temporarily visiting the United States. Such action is recommended to enable the Secretary of State to enter upon negotiations with foreign Governments with a view to obtaining reciprocal modification of existing restrictions and fees.

The recommendations of the Secretary of State have my full concurrence.

WARREN G. HARDING.

Inclosure: From Secretary of State as above.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 5, 1923.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Several gentlemen about me, interested in the subject matter of the President's message, have asked me if the accompanying document will be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will it be published as a document?

The SPEAKER. Unless the Chair thinks it of special importance he will not order it printed. The Chair has not looked at it yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the Committee on Immigration is interested in the subject, and if it is not too long I think it would be a good idea to have it printed in the RECORD. If that meets the approval of gentlemen on the majority side I will ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the document accompanying the President's message be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Should not the gentleman ask unanimous consent to have it published as a document? I think that would be better.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That may be. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the document accompanying the President's message be printed as a document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SERVICES IN HONOR OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MONTOYA.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit an order which I send to the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of an order which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, February 25, 1923, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. NESTOR MONTOYA, late a Representative from the State of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with permission granted by unanimous consent of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD and print this so-called "slacker lists," I desire to call attention to a letter from The Adjutant General's Office, dated January 31, 1923.

It is my intention to insert these lists on the 5th day of each month, until all of the names are printed. No good soldier will be injured by the publication of his name in these lists, but, on the contrary, if his military record is one to be proud of the publication will only serve to call attention to that record. If by mistake the names of good soldiers have not been eliminated from the record, it will be my pleasure and duty to insert in the RECORD the facts in each individual case and to see that the facts are brought to the attention of the Secretary of War, who is as anxious as any soldier of the late war with Germany to have the records correct. Mistakes ought to be corrected while the men are living and while there is evidence to substantiate any valid claim as to service.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,

HON. ROYAL C. JOHNSON,

MY DEAR MR. The men whose names appear below and who were under the jurisdiction of the local boards named, were, according to the public draft records, classified and reported by the draft authorities as deserters from the military service of the United States. The lists in which these names were originally included have been given at least one month's publicity.

The name of any man who, since the publication of the lists, has been found to have actually served in either our own forces or in those of the Allies during the period between May 18, 1917, and November 11, 1918, is not included; nor is that of any man who, though he rendered no service during the period mentioned, has, since the publication of his name, been found to have been erroneously inducted or to have been erroneously certified as a deserter, nor that of any man who is known to be no longer living.

Every reasonable effort has been made by the War Department to eliminate from these lists names which, for any of the aforementioned reasons, should not appear thereon. Should it develop, however, that certain of the names listed below should, for any of these reasons, likewise be removed, notice to that effect will be published in each such case in a later issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

STATE OF UTAH,

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 31st day of January, 1923.

[SEAL.]

H. E. CROCKETT,
Secretary of State.

Petitioning the Congress of the United States to assist the silver-mining industry.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

"Whereas the production of silver is an important industry of the United States, and affords employment directly to many thousands of persons and indirectly to thousands of others; and

"Whereas on account of its association with other metals, especially lead and zinc, in ores, and inadequate price for silver increases the cost of production of lead and zinc, and thereby adds to the cost of materials essential to many constructive activities; and

"Whereas it is also desirable to maintain silver-mining operations in the United States, so as to meet the coinage requirements of various countries in which commerce and industry are in process of rehabilitation and can not be fully reestablished without additional supplies of metallic money; and

"Whereas the prospective early completion of silver repurchases under the provisions of the Pittman Act is liable to disrupt the silver-mining industry of the United States and in part suspend silver production unless measures be taken to preserve the industry;

"Now, therefore, the Governor and Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to give sympathetic and early consideration to this phase of the silver-mining industry and enact such legislation as may be necessary in the premises."

The foregoing memorial was publicly read by title and immediately thereafter signed by the president of the senate, in the presence of the house over which he presides, and the fact of such signing duly entered upon the journal this 30th day of January, 1923.

Mr. BROOKHART presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas many million dollars of farm loans in Iowa are coming due March 1, 1923, and a large number of Iowa farmers are desirous of availing themselves of the opportunities offered in the amendment, now before Congress, to the farm loan act;

Be it resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the Iowa delegation in Congress be requested to use all honorable means in securing the adoption of this Federal farm loan amendment at the earliest possible date.

J. H. ANDERSON,
Speaker of the House.
JOHN HAMMILL,

A. C. GUSTAFSON,
Clerk of the House.

Mr. BROOKHART presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That—

Whereas it is impracticable for the Interstate Commerce Commission to attempt to supervise the distribution of cars as between individual shippers throughout the United States; and

Whereas there should be some governmental authority within reasonable reach to which appeal can be made to require equitable distribution of cars without regard to whether the same are to be used for shipments interstate or intrastate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we respectfully urge upon Congress the amendment of the interstate commerce act in such way that the regulatory authorities of the States may make reasonable orders and regulations not in conflict with Federal law, or with lawful orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, requiring cars within the respective borders of such States to be equitably distributed to shippers desiring the same, without regard to whether they are desired for use in shipments that are interstate or intrastate.

We urge upon Congress the repeal of section 15a of the interstate commerce act as amended by the Esch-Cummins Act and the making of such other amendments thereto as shall clearly limit and define the power as exists between the Interstate Commerce Commission and State commissions, that there may be no misunderstanding that the State commissions definitely have the same authority over rates as existed before the enactment of the transportation act.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to each United States Senator and each Member of Congress from Iowa.

JOHN HAMMILL,
President of the Senate.
L. W. AINSWORTH,
Secretary of the Senate.
J. H. ANDERSON,
Speaker of the House.
A. C. GUSTAFSON,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. BROOKHART presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That—

"Whereas, by section 19a of the interstate commerce act, providing for the valuation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the properties of common carriers, it is provided that 'such investigation shall show the value of its property in each of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, classified and in detail as herein required'; and

"Whereas the commission in its valuation reports thus far made has shown the values of properties covered by such reports in each case as a whole only, and has failed to show the values thereof 'in each of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia'; and

"Whereas the Bureau of Valuation of said commission has recommended to the commission that it request Congress to relieve it from showing the values of said properties by States; and

"Whereas it is desirable for various uses and purposes that such valuation shall be shown separately by States, as aforesaid:

Resolved, That the Fortieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa, now in session, expresses its view that the Interstate Commerce Commission should show as to each interstate carrier the value of its property in each of the several States in which said property exists, and that no change in the law to sanction failure to make such showing ought to be sought or made; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to each United States Senator and each Member of Congress from Iowa."

J. H. ANDERSON,
Speaker of the House.
JOHN HAMMILL,
President of the Senate.
A. C. GUSTAFSON,
Clerk of the House.

Introduced January 17, 1923; rules suspended, adopted; messaged to senate January 17; substituted for senate resolution; adopted by senate January 18, 1923.

Mr. NORBECK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress and our Senators and Representatives in Congress to amend section 2 of House Resolution 8744, approved December 21, 1921, and enact in lieu thereof an act to require the completion of a steel bridge at Chamberlain, S. Dak., as required by act of Congress approved April 28, 1916, said bridge to be completed during the year 1923.

Whereas by an act of Congress dated April 28, 1916, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. was authorized to construct a steel bridge across the Missouri River at Chamberlain, S. Dak., and permission granted to continue the use of a pontoon bridge for the transportation of freight and passengers across said river until the completion of said steel bridge; and

Whereas the right to construct said bridge was extended by act of Congress approved February 25, 1919, and by a further act of Congress approved December 21, 1921, which last-named act extends the time for the completion of said bridge to April 28, 1925; and

Whereas said Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. began the construction of and completed a portion of said bridge in the year 1918, but has wholly failed to do anything toward the completion thereof since the early part of 1919; and

Whereas the use of said pontoon bridge is believed to endanger the lives of the employees of said railroad operating trains thereon and the lives of the traveling public; and

Whereas serious and costly accidents and delays in transportation have already occurred, to wit:

First. That on or about June 21, 1922, while a gravel train was crossing said bridge, the pontoon used as a draw upset and caused the engine and several cars to be thrown into the Missouri River, together with the engineer, who was seriously injured.

Second. That during the spring of the year when the ice is going out and during the June rise and in the fall of the year, and when the ice is forming or floating in said river, it is impossible to operate the draw in said bridge, and by reason of that fact all passenger, mail, freight, and express traffic to points west of the Missouri River is greatly delayed, especially when said bridge is out or draw open, and the development of the country deterred, and the business interests of the people located between Chamberlain and Rapid City, S. Dak., jeopardized: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States and our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, urged to use all honorable means at their command to secure an amendment to section 2 of House Resolution 8744, which shall require the completion of said bridge not later than during the year 1923; and be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this preamble and resolution be prepared by the secretary of the senate, signed by the presiding officers of the senate and house of representatives and forwarded to the Congress of the United States and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Secretary of War.

Mr. NORBECK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

A concurrent resolution requesting and demanding modification and revision of the present Federal standards for grading grain.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring): That the Bureau of Markets of the United States Department of Agriculture in the spring of 1917 promulgated certain standards for grading wheat which revolutionized the system of grain inspection to such an extent that the markets were seriously disturbed and confused and the Federal rules were found unsatisfactory in commercial transactions, and as subsequent attempts by the said Bureau of Markets to amend the original standards and inspection rules have not removed the features objectionable to the wheat producers of South Dakota and the rural shippers of grain, with the result that the present standards are regarded by the farmers of the Northwest as unfair and unreasonable; and

Whereas the grades so established do not meet with the approval of the grain growers and shippers of this State and are believed to confer an undue advantage to the buyers, with a consequent discrimination against the farmers, thereby causing heavy losses every year; and

Whereas the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, at a meeting held in Helena, Mont., March 16, 1918, by Federal resolution proposed standards for grading spring wheat which were declared to be fair to all interests directly concerned; and

Whereas the South Dakota Farm Bureau Federation, the South Dakota Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association, and other farm and grain organizations repeatedly have declared in favor of substantial modification of the Federal standards so that grain may be tested and graded in accordance with its milling value, and representatives of the States of the Northwest having appeared before the Federal Department of Agriculture and the Committee on Agriculture of both Houses of Congress advocating and urging action favorable to the requests and needs of the farmers of South Dakota; and

Whereas the legislators of Minnesota and North Dakota directed the promulgation of State grades for use in the inspection of grain produced and marketed within those States, the purposes of such legislation being to give the wheat producers of those States all the benefit possible from the application of State rules and regulations, but this plan was found not feasible because of conflict with the Federal rules and laws; and

Whereas the Millers' National Federation has opposed the efforts of the farmers of the State to obtain a modification and revision of the Federal grain standards; and

Whereas HALVOR STEENERSON, Congressman from the ninth district of Minnesota, has introduced a bill in Congress to establish standards for the grading of spring wheat, which, if adopted, will virtually recognize the milling value of wheat and place the producers and the buyers on an equal footing in the grain markets of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, That it hereby, in behalf of the people of South Dakota, requests and demands that the Federal authorities, either in Congress or in the Department of Agriculture, do so modify, revise, or amend the present Federal standards for grading spring wheat as to comply with the requests of the farmers of South Dakota and the Northwest, and thereby remove the present discriminations and penalties in order to promote the prosperity and welfare of the agricultural interests of South Dakota and the Northwest; be it further

Resolved, That we approve the aforesaid Steenerson grain grading bill, and urge its immediate passage by Congress; be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, to both Houses of Congress, and to the individual Members of the South Dakota delegation in Congress.

President of the Senate.

Secretary of the Senate.

Speaker of the House.

Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. NORBECK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

A concurrent resolution requesting and demanding modification and reduction of the present freight rates for grain and live stock.

Whereas the present freight rates for shipment of grain and live stock by the railroads are excessive and of such a nature as to render the prices received by producers of such commodities less than the cost of production; and

Whereas several efforts have been made by the railroad commissioners of the State of South Dakota to secure reductions that are necessary for the preservation of the great industry of agriculture in the State of South Dakota; and

Whereas the rates now in force are approximately 20 per cent higher than the rates in force prior to 1918; and

Whereas the prices of farm products to the producer in this State are approximately 20 per cent lower than the average prices received by such producers for such commodities during the 10-year period just preceding the year 1918: Be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring): That it hereby, in behalf of the people of the State of South Dakota, requests and demands that the Congress of the United States, by appropriate legislation or otherwise, and the Interstate Commerce Commission and all other bodies of the Federal Government having in their power or discretion to modify, reduce, revise, or amend the present freight rates, perform such duties as to comply with the requests of the farmers of the State of South Dakota and the Northwest, and thereby remove this menace to the prosperity and welfare of the agricultural interests of South Dakota and the Northwest; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be prepared by the secretary of state and forwarded to our Representatives and Senators in Congress, to the Secretary of the Senate, and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to His Excellency the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding.

E. O. FRESKOLN,

Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NORBECK presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to give immediate and careful consideration to Senate bill No. 4130.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring):

Whereas a bill raising the limit on Federal farm loans from $10,000 to $25,000 has been introduced in Congress and which is now in the Committee on Banking and Currency: Therefore

We urge our delegation in Congress to do their utmost to secure speedy and favorable action by the committee and thereafter its prompt passage by Congress, so that it may become the law before March 1, 1923, at which time there are many Federal farm loans to be closed exceeding $10,000 in amount.

That the passage of this bill will not in any manner impair the operation nor the credit of the Federal land bank, but will result in extending its scope of usefulness so that a larger number of borrowers can be reached.

That all loans are made on the basis of the security offered, and borrowers of large amounts often offer the best security, owing to their executive ability and industry in the management of farm operation.

That the Federal land bank is seriously hampered in its operation owing to the $10,000 limit; be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution be prepared by the secretary of state, signed by the presiding officers of the senate and the house of representatives, and forward one copy each to Senators NORBECK and STERLING and Congressmen CHRISTOPHERSON, JOHNSON, and WILLIAMSON, to the Secretary of the Senate and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to His Excellency the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding.

ELLEN M. STONE RANSOM FUND.

Mr. LODGE. I report back favorably, without amendment, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, the bill (S. 543) for the relief of contributors of the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund. A similar bill was elaborately reported on by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and has passed the Senate several times. I ask for its present consideration. I think there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to return, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to such contributors, or, in the event of the death of any such contributor, to the legal representative thereof, as may file their claims within one year from the passage of this act, the money subscribed by such contributor to pay the ransom for the release of Miss Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary to Turkey, who was abducted by brigands on September 3, 1901, said total sum not to exceed $66,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 4486) to amend section 5200 of the Revised Statutes as amended; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 4487) making section 1535c of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia applicable to the municipal court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4488) granting a pension to A. M. Nestor (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4489) for the relief of Roy A. Darling; and
A bill (S. 4490) for the relief of Charles D. Baylis, first lieutenant, United States Marine Corps (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISTRICT STREET-RAILWAY FARES.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2589) to amend section 11 of the act entitled "An act for the retirement of public school-teachers in the District of Columbia," approved January 15, 1920, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3252) to amend paragraph 8 of the act entitled "An act relating to the metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, as amended, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4012) to control the possession, sale, and use of pistols and revolvers in the District of Columbia, to provide penalties, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4283) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to require operators of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia to secure a permit, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 266) authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 7103. An act to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SALARIES OF SENATORS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 248) to provide for the payment of salaries of Senators appointed to fill vacancies, and for other purposes, which was in line 7, after the word "qualify," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That where no appointments have been made to fill such vacancies, the salaries of Senators elected to fill such vacancies shall commence on the day following their election.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the Senate passed this joint resolution to correct a little difficulty we had some time ago providing that the compensation of appointed Senators should run until their successors who were elected qualified. The House has passed it, but added a very wise amendment.

It might happen that a Senator died in the last of September and there would be no appointment, as the governor would wait, that at the election in November the vacancy might be filled. In that case, when the Senator was elected in November, there having been no appointment made, of course his salary ought to commence from the day of election rather than from the day of qualification. The amendment of the House cures that omission in our joint resolution, and I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS IN MONTANA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1878) to permit the State of Montana to exchange cut-over timberlands granted for educational purposes for other lands of like character and approximate value.

The amendment of the House was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "ship," to insert "which exchanged land shall be subject to the same requirements and limitations."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill from the Senate (S. 4029) amendatory of and supplemental to an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Co., and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts supplemental thereto, approved, respectively, May 2, 1872, March 3, 1873, and June 22, 1874, which were, on page 2, line 11, to strike out "but not in excess of $85,000,"; on page 3, line 17, to strike out "as far as applicable"; on page 4, line 8, after "State," to insert: "Provided, That no civil suit in tort brought against said railway company in the State courts of Louisiana or Arkansas may be removed by said railway company to any court of the United States on account of diverse citizenship."

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend and supplement the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1871, and acts supplemental thereto, approved, respectively, May 2, 1872, March 3, 1873, and June 22, 1874."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE NEAR CITY OF HOOD RIVER, OREG.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4341) granting the consent of Congress to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co. and its successors to construct a toll bridge across the Columbia River at or near the city of Hood River, Oreg., which were on page 1, line 6, to strike out "toll," and to amend the title so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co. and its successors to construct a bridge across the Columbia River at or near the city of Hood River, Oreg."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, under the act of 1906, providing the general conditions under which bridges may be built across navigable streams, toll charges are permitted, but they are subject, of course, to the control of the Secretary of War. Therefore I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

RETURN OF AMERICAN TROOPS FROM GERMANY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to Senate Concurrent Resolution 36, providing for the appointment of a committee of Congress to meet at Savannah, Ga., the last contingent of American troops returning from Germany on the St. Mihiel, the Chair appoints the following Senators as members of the committee on the part of the Senate: Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. WARREN, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. ROBINSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES). The Secretary will report the first of the committee amendments passed over.

The READING CLERK. On page 21 the committee proposes to strike out lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, and on page 22 lines 1 and 2, in the following words:

None of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for payment of any officer of the Army on the active or retired list while such officer is engaged in the business of selling supplies or services to the United States, or is employed by any individual, partnership, or corporation which engages in such business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next of the amendments passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over was, on page 106, line 15, to reduce the appropriation for examinations, surveys, and contingencies for rivers and harbors for which there may be no special appropriation from "$456,850" to "$406,850."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 106, line 17, after the word "law," to insert "or for investigations covering types of boats," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for any preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate not authorized by law or for investigations concerning types of boats.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 106, at the end of line 12, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $250,000 of this appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended between Sioux City, Iowa, and Fort Benton, Mont., for the removal of obstructions, the revetment of shores where the same may be necessary, and for the maintenance of the channel to landing places and at points where the railroads intersect the Missouri River, said last-mentioned sum to be immediately available.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment has to do with the figures found in line 12?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has.

Mr. KING. Then I move the following amendment, though I am not sure whether it is germane or not. I move to strike out the figures "$56,589,910" and to insert in lieu thereof—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that his amendment is not in order at this time. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McNARY. May I inquire what is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], which has been once reported. The Secretary, however, will read the amendment again for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk again read Mr. McCUMBER's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is an endeavor to provide by act of Congress that a certain portion of the $56,000,000 appropriation shall be spent on a certain project. The amendment provides, in effect, that $250,000 of the $56,000,000 shall be spent at that particular place named. It is a grave question in my mind whether this is a good policy, in view of the action of the Congress during the last four or five years by which river and harbor appropriations have been made in a lump sum, and the Engineer Corps, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the President, have determined how that lump sum shall be spent on the various approved projects. If we are going to commence to single out certain projects and mention them in connection with the lump sum to be appropriated, it would only be fair that amendments should be offered for practically every separate project that has been approved by the Congress in the past.

I am not certain, Mr. President, whether this amendment is in order or not. Of course, the sum of $250,000 is not estimated for that project, nor has this specific appropriation been reported from a standing committee. On the other hand, it may be said that the $250,000 is not an increase of the appropriation, because it is to be taken out of the general appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is in the nature of a limitation upon the expenditure of the appropriation, and is therefore in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That the appropriation is in the nature of a limitation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I notice that it does not say "that not more than $250,000 shall be spent." That would be a limitation, as I understand the meaning of the word "limitation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nevertheless, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this is a most important amendment in the sense that the money which is to be appropriated is to be used on the Missouri River for the purpose of navigation. I have assumed all the time that in framing bills proposing to appropriate money for rivers and harbors such appropriations were intended to promote navigation. I think for about 50 years some engineers have been stationed at Kansas City, Mo.; their homes are at that place. They have spent their time in making recommendations and in digging out one year a channel which fills up the next year; so that during all of this time we have got nothing whatever, as I understand the situation, to show that the millions upon millions of dollars which have been appropriated and which have gone into the Missouri project have been used for the advantage of any navigation upon the Missouri River.

The only navigation, Mr. President, upon the Missouri River is on the upper Missouri or that portion of the Missouri between Sioux City, Iowa, and Fort Benton, Mont. There have been small boats plying between those two points for a great many years. A number of our transcontinental railway lines, including the Great Northern, the Soo, the Northern Pacific, the Milwaukee, and one or two other important railroad lines, all cross the Missouri River north of those points. Some coal, hay, wheat, and other grain are brought from warehouses along the river to the intersection with the railroads; so that the transportation of these commodities over the railroads is but a continuation of their transportation over the water. This kind of transportation has been carried on during all of these hard years. South of Sioux City, however, where there have been spent millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, there has not a single boat been in operation for the purpose of carrying any kind of commerce. The only commerce which is carried on the river in the vicinity of Kansas City is a small quantity of sand dug out of the river, loaded into barges, and used for building purposes. There is no real commerce south of Sioux City.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. Can the Senator inform the Senate as to whether or not this specific project has been authorized by law? I have not had time to look it up.

Mr. McCUMBER. No particular project has been authorized. The estimate made by the Budget Bureau upon the recommendation of the engineers has been that about $15,000 could be properly used along that entire stretch of the Missouri River where there is commerce, and that fifty-odd million dollars can be used where there is no commerce, where there is no prospect of any commerce, and never has been any since we started on the project of digging out the sand one year in order to clear the channel, and the next year, because the upper Missouri has not been protected, and consequently the same amount of soil is washed down, doing the entire work over again. I am saying that much in reference to the matter of making the appropriation of any use to us at all.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota if this project is one that has heretofore been authorized by the Congress?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not say that the particular project has been authorized; but let me say to the Senator, suppose in the year 1922 a point between Bismarck and Williston, for instance, the river begins to cut in on the banks and to change its channel. The necessity for revetment work at that particular point of course is a project that has not been considered; there has been nobody there to consider it. The engineers with their families make excursions up the Missouri River once a year and locate a few snags, go up the next year and blow them out with dynamite, and pay $15,000 or $20,000 for running their boats up there for one trip. That is the extent of the work they consider necessary for commerce on the upper Missouri.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator has the Government ever recognized this project in the appropriation of any money?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. The Government has appropriated $150,000 and sometimes as high, I think, as $200,000 to be used above Sioux City.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator another question. What is the volume of commerce that is carried up and down the stream?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not give the Senator the volume of the commerce for the last year or two because of the fact that the failure of crops in that section of the country has made the commerce almost nil during that period. I understand, however, there are about four or five boats being run regularly on that section of the Missouri and that they will transport crops alone of about a million bushels of wheat from last year's crop.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator from North Dakota believe, the appropriation provided in the bill being in the shape of a lump sum, that it would prevent the engineers from using a portion of it to do the very work described in his amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. We have that inquiry and the answer is that they can not use over $10,000, because of certain estimates that were made to the Budget Bureau. Therefore they are limited in their expenditures on the upper stretches of the Missouri.

Mr. McNARY. Is that the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget or of the engineers?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget, made upon the recommendation of the engineers.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator is mistaken as to that. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget estimated an expenditure of $26,000,000, while this bill carries $56,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. The captain of one of the vessels plying on the upper Missouri applied to the department only two days ago, and he was informed by the engineers that they could not use more than the amount carried in their estimate to the Budget Bureau, and that was $10,000 or $15,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that the Budget Bureau recommended approximately $27,000,000 or $28,000,000 and the House entirely disregarded the recommendation of the Budget Bureau and the Senate committee also disregarded the recommendation of the Budget Bureau, I rise to inquire of the Senator how he can insist now that the engineers of the Government are bound by any appropriation which Congress may make, unless there be in the appropriation itself words of limitation?

The Budget Bureau made certain recommendations based upon an appropriation of $28,000,000. That $28,000,000, under the Budget estimate, I presume, was allocated to the various projects, new and old. If the House disregards those allocations and the aggregate amount of the allocations and gives a sum double the amount recommended by the Budget Bureau, I am not quite clear, and I should be happy to have the learned Senator advise me, how those who are to expend the sum would feel that the allocations set forth by the Budget Bureau constitute any limitation upon them?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that question involves another question which I might ask of the Senator from Utah, and that is, who is to determine how much of this appropriation shall be used in any specific section of the Missouri?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I presume that this appropriation goes to the Board of Engineers, or the Rivers and Harbors Commission, however they may be denominated, and they expend the money as they see fit.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right. Now, suppose the engineers have already reported to the Budget Bureau that they do not need more than ten or fifteen thousand dollars for use above Sioux City, Iowa, on the Missouri, where the only commerce is on the river. What may we expect in the way of expenditure on that section of the Missouri?

Mr. KING. I presume, if the Senator puts it that way, that if the engineers have allocated fifty-seven or fifty-eight millions, the amount that is found in this bill, and have allowed only $10,000 for the project which the Senator is contending for now, they doubtless would be constrained to follow that recommendation which they had made; but the point I made a moment ago, and I still insist upon it, is this: Technically, the Budget Bureau having absolutely disregarded the recommendations of the engineers—the engineers having recommended approximately $71,000,000, including certain work upon the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers—and recommended an appropriation of twenty-seven or twenty-eight million dollars, it would seem to me, unless there were limitations expressed in the bill with respect to the disposition of that twenty-seven or twenty-eight million dollars, that the engineers could dispose of it substantially as they saw fit. I am not sure that they would be bound, technically or legally, by statements which they had made or recommendations which they had submitted to the Budget Bureau.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator now is getting right down to the root of the evil of the situation, and that is this: The engineers never have been able to see the value of the use of any sum of money in that stretch of the Missouri where we have river commerce, but they have some kind of a scheme with reference to a great waterway between Kansas City and the Gulf of Mexico, which scheme never has been brought into existence so far in the matter of development, for the reason that the dirt, the sand, the soil, the silt which flows down the Missouri one year is dug out of the channel the next year, and this course has been followed year after year with no appreciable advantage to the commerce of the United States, while we go begging for a few thousand dollars to protect our shores and protect our landings and pull the snags and rocks out of the channel and keep the channel in its place where the only commerce on the Missouri now exists. It is a case in which the engineers seem to have in view some project for the future which may or may not develop, while those of us who believe that we ought to use some of the money to maintain the commerce that we now have, and to clear the river of obstructions in that section of the country, do not want to be left any longer at the mercy of these engineers, who make an estimate of $10,000 for use on a stretch of twelve or fourteen hundred miles of the river which is navigated, and fifty-odd millions of dollars on a stretch of the river where there is no navigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, I might clarify the situation a little for the Senator from Utah.

The engineers reported that they could profitably expend, advisably expend, during the year ending June 30, 1924, $56,590,410, which is substantially the sum appropriated by this bill as it came from the House. The Senator from Utah desires to see that sum reduced. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota contemplates setting apart $250,000 of this $60,000,000 for this particular purpose. If the total amount is reduced, as contemplated by the Senator from Utah, I am perfectly certain that the Senator from North Dakota will be quite willing to reduce proportionately the amount which he seeks thus to set aside.

In other words, I am endeavoring to indicate to the Senator from Utah that the subjects which he is discussing have no relevancy to the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota. Included in the $56,000,000 thus recommended by the engineers are three items. One of them is the Missouri River, from Kansas City to its mouth, $1,000,000; for improvement, $500,000. That is a million and a half for the Missouri River, from Kansas City to its mouth. The mouth of the Missouri River is just above St. Louis, according to my recollection, so that $1,500,000 is to be spent in the State of Missouri between Kansas City and the mouth of the Missouri as it enters the Mississippi; $25,000 is to be expended on the river from Kansas City to Sioux City; and $15,000 from Sioux City, 600 miles of river, to Fort Benton, Mont. The Senator from North Dakota is simply inviting attention to the fact that that distribution is eminently unfair, that is all. I am perfectly certain that the Senator will agree, if the amendment which the Senator from Utah proposes to offer should prevail and the amount should be scaled down, that the amount which he asks should be scaled proportionately. In other words, I can see nothing in what the Senator from Utah has to say concerning the aggregate sum that in anywise whatever militates against the amendment now tendered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STERLING, Mr. WILLIS, and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I first yield to the Senator from South Dakota, who addressed me a moment ago.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I just want to correct a statement that I understood the Senator from Montana to make as to the distance from Sioux City to Fort Benton. I understood him to say it was 600 miles. It is a distance of about 1,500 miles from Sioux City to Fort Benton, which is termed the "head of navigation," as I understand; and, according to the report of the engineers, only $15,000 could be profitably expended for all that distance of 1,500 miles.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator for a question. Then I want to yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. KING. It is a little more than a question. It was a brief reference to what has been said—

Mr. McCUMBER. As the Senator from Ohio rose first, will the Senator allow me to yield to him first?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Montana. What authority of law does the Senator claim there is for this proposed appropriation? When did the Congress by any act authorize an appropriation of funds for this purpose? Can the Senator cite that act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, appropriations for this purpose have been made regularly for 50 years. It may not be known to the Senator that as early as 1866 there was between my State and his a continuous line of river transportation. We bought supplies in endless quantities from his State that went down the Ohio River, up the Mississippi, and up the Missouri to Fort Benton. During all of that period appropriations were made for just exactly the purpose which this appropriation is for.

Mr. WILLIS. I am familiar with the commerce to which the Senator refers, but he does not quite respond to my inquiry. This amendment, I believe, contemplates the addition of a new project, where it says:

For the maintenance of the channel to landing places.

The Senator is perfectly familiar with the practice here, that Congress must and does pass an act authorizing appropriations for a certain purpose. If the Senator can refer me to the act in which this project was approved, I should like to have the reference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have given it to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. What is it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. An item for the improvement of the river above Sioux City has been a regular portion of the appropriation every year. Of course, there is no appropriation for taking a snag out of the river where the town line between townships 10 and 11 crosses the Missouri River. There is an appropriation regularly for the improvement of the river above Sioux City, and that is all that is asked here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I want to state to the Senator from Ohio that several times I have succeeded in having the river and harbor bill amended, and amended substantially in the language that I have employed here, namely, for revetment and for protecting the channel and the approaches of the upper Missouri. There is nothing new in the language that is used. In fact, the language I have used is the same that we have used in other amendments.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to another feature of this bill and this proposed amendment. Since the creation, I presume, the Little Missouri, the Yellowstone River, the Knife River, and other important rivers have been pouring their silt down the Missouri River. Without that there would have been no Louisiana to-day. Louisiana and much of Mississippi and other sections of this country are made from the flow of the soil and the silt from the Missouri and its tributaries. Now, where does this come from? Not from the original source of the Yellowstone; but the moment that it strikes the level country there is somewhere above, I think, 1,500 feet of this silt that is washed down from the mountains, from that up to 1,700 feet, before you get down to a blue clay, and when you get down to the blue clay you are then at an altitude about the same as the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. McCUMBER. The channel first cuts on one side, and then, from some little obstruction or a sand bar, the whole force of the high water is thrown against the bank upon the other side, and not only acres but whole quarter sections of land are tumbled off into the Missouri and washed down the channel until it finally reaches the Gulf of Mexico, or the greater portion of it reaches around about Kansas City, and is then shoveled out of the channel again to make way for the new amount that will come in the next year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will just let me finish the thought, how can we prevent this? One way in which we can prevent it, Mr. President, is by the revetment of the shores where the cave-in takes place. That will prevent whole sections of land tumbling into the Missouri, which must be taken out again farther down the Missouri, for which we are appropriating large sums every year.

I have here a photograph of a section of the Missouri River at Bismarck [exhibiting]. If Senators would look at this photograph, which is a picture of a scene above a new bridge which the Government, in connection with the State, has just built, they would find that the shores have been revetted, and they have been for a great many years. The engineers do not see fit generally to make the revetment properly, but when they have joined with the Northern Pacific or other railway in doing it, and when it has been done properly, it has been a success.

It is done in this way: In the wintertime, when the Missouri is frozen over, with sometimes 2 or 3 feet of ice, and when it is at its lowest depth, they put willows on the ice and pile large rocks on them, then more willows and rocks. Then they saw through the ice around this construction, and it sinks, and as the ice melts the whole mass settles down into the silt, the wash of the spring flood comes in and fills it up with sand, and you have a revetment which stays and prevents the current washing the banks off again.

Let us look at the situation at Bismarck. Tapping the Missouri at this point is the Bismarck Water Co., and the banks there have been revetted. At this point there is the great railway bridge across the Missouri of the Northern Pacific, and a few rods below that is the wagon bridge which has just been built by the Government of the United States.

I would like to call attention to another angle of this photograph, and I will ask the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to glance at it for a moment. If he will look over to the northwest he will find a level piece of land, very low, running about 6 miles by the city of Mandan. All of this is made a part of the bridge project on the recommendation of the Government engineers. The flood is coming down and is cutting across at the point I mentioned. It may be that in a single year it will cut through there and the entire current of the river will run through on this side, and it will be necessary to build a bridge across another Missouri River in order to complete it. A little revetment at this time, not $10,000 worth, not $15,000 or $16,000 worth, but enough to save that one little corner, would be worth millions and millions of dollars to the Government of the United States and to the State in putting the bridge through. But nothing is done. A little appropriation of $15,000 would amount to nothing. We want to prevent not only the caving in at this section of the river, but we want to protect the Government property in the matter of these roads and bridges which the Government and the State together have builded across the Missouri.

If you go a little farther up the Missouri River you will find other sections which are not low, but are high, where the banks stand up 80 or 100 or 200 or 300 feet above the Missouri River, and the change of the current against those banks undermines them, and acres, aye, hundreds of acres, come tumbling off into the Missouri, to be shoveled up again at Kansas City and taken out of the bed of the stream. Here a great deal can be saved by proper revetting. Let us remember, too, that at this point there are farmers' grain elevators. The moment the current is changed no vessel can get up to a landing, of course, and no vessel getting up to a landing the commerce from that section of the country is cut out entirely. We can prevent that by a little revetting.

The Senator from Florida will pardon me; I now yield to him.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that while this project was adopted a good many years ago there have been no appropriations in recent years, I think probably since 1916, certainly not since 1919, for continuing the improvement, for the reason that it is not a problem of navigation so much as it is a question of saving land on the shore. This revetting work, the engineers have held, ought to be done by the people who own the land, rather than have the Government undertake to protect the shores of the Missouri River 1,100 miles in order to prevent the washing away.

Mr. McCUMBER. I notice, however, that the Government has spent millions of dollars to build dikes to keep the Mississippi River in its proper channel and prevent it from overflowing New Orleans and other great cities. If it can spend hundred of millions of dollars for those dikes, the Senator can well answer that the Government should not do it, but that the adjoining landowners ought to pay the expense of the diking. What is the difference whether you build up a dike to prevent the water from overflowing orrevet to prevent the stream from cutting any farther and undermining great sections of the country?

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to call attention to a statement in the hearings made by General Taylor. I read from the hearings:

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand, the river north of the mouth of the Missouri is navigable if there is a fair supply of water?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir; the minimum depth throughout the entire stretch at ordinary low water is about 4½ feet.

General Taylor then said:

The project for the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth was adopted by the act of 1912 with a view to its completion in 10 years. The estimated cost of the project at that time was $20,000,000, so that following out the intent of that law Congress should have given $2,000,000 a year; there have been very much less sums than that appropriated and we have, consequently, been doing very little work. The project has reached the stage where it either ought to be proceeded with or it ought to be stopped, one or the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. When was the last substantial work done on the project?

General TAYLOR. In 1918, $1,000,000 was allotted, and in 1919 $100,000 was appropriated; those were itemized appropriation acts.

We have not had any itemized appropriation act since 1919. Since then we have had a lump-sum appropriation. General Taylor continues:

In 1920, 1921, and 1922 there were lump sums from which the Secretary of War made allotments, and from those acts there have been $200,000, $214,000, and $100,000, respectively, allotted. In other words, for the last three years we have been simply endeavoring to maintain the work which had been previously done in order that it should not be entirely lost. If we are to go ahead with the work we ought to have $1,500,000 at least, but if we are not to go ahead with it we need less money. The Missouri River runs through a very fertile bottom land; it naturally wanders from one side of the valley to the other, destroying farm lands as it wanders from one side to the other. Recently the farmers along the Missouri River, particularly in the vicinity of Omaha and above and a little below, have realized the inadvisability of waiting for the Government to protect their lands, and they have been forming protection districts under State laws, which they can do, and issuing bonds for the work, assessing the lands for proper contributions and doing the work themselves.

In the last year there has been over $1,000,000 worth of work done on the Missouri River in that way. The value of the lands protected has been enormously increased by this work; it not only increases the value of the lands but the work holds the river in position. If the farmers all along the Missouri River would do that work and protect their lands as they should, the Government could then step in and do the work necessary to complete the improvements for navigation at comparatively small expense. I say at comparatively small expense; it would run, perhaps, to millions of dollars.

Mr. Sisson. There is a long stretch of river there?

General TAYLOR. Yes; there is. It is 398 miles from Kansas City to the mouth; from Kansas City to Fort Benton, Mont., the head of navigation, it is 1,887 miles. The expense for navigation per mile would be small, but that should properly be done after the people living along the banks have done the work which belongs to them to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no navigation on the river to-day?

General TAYLOR. Above Kansas City there is practically nothing and below Kansas City there is little.

Mr. STAFFORD. Local or through?

General TAYLOR. It is all local at the present time. There was a navigation company organized to carry on through navigation between Kansas City and St. Louis several years ago; those boats were bought by the Government in 1917 and they form a part of the fleet of the Mississippi River-Warrior Transportation Line at the present time.

Mr. STAFFORD. There has been no proposal by the owners of the land along the river banks to revet their banks, through the legislature, the municipalities, or organizations, and have the Government do the work so far as dredging the proper channel is concerned?

General TAYLOR. No, sir; there has been no proposition of that kind from them to us. They have, as I have stated, improved the river banks in many localities.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was done for the purpose of protecting their lands?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where was this work done of revetting the banks along the Missouri River—between Kansas City and St. Louis?

General TAYLOR. Principally above Kansas City.

So it seems that the main work now necessary to be done is being proceeded with by the people who own the land, and the only appropriation recommended by the engineers is that for maintenance. These items of $15,000 and $25,000 and $15,000 are simply maintenance items, and they are not intended to be used at all for new work. The engineers have said that we must go on with the improvement from Kansas City to the mouth of the river or abandon the whole project, and for that purpose they recommend $1,000,000 for improvement and $500,000 for maintenance for that stretch of the river. In the meantime, the real work to be done in the upper Missouri, it would seem, is the revetment work, to prevent the river from overflowing and washing away the land, and that is being done.

I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to this testimony before the committee, and suggest also that perhaps he knows of the patent arrangement whereby they are taking down trees and anchoring them, and tying them together with wire, thereby really accomplishing very great results all along the Missouri. I think the Army engineers have approved that process, and it is working splendidly. But the main thing now is the revetment work, which the Senator has so graphically described as resulting in shifting the channel of the river from time to time, washing away great areas on one side and putting them on the other, and vice versa. That is the main thing to be stopped; but the thought is that it is incumbent on the owners of the land being affected to do that. They are proceeding to overcome those difficulties by this revetment process, and when they get that sufficiently well under way, then the Government ought to step in and take care of the channel, and I think that is their purpose. In the meantime, the appropriation they are asking for is for maintenance.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, answering the Senator most briefly, I do not suppose there is a landowner in my State, or in the State of South Dakota, or in the State of Montana, who asks the Government to expend one penny to protect his land.

Those who are operating boats on the upper Missouri are asking the Government to expend some of its money to protect the channels of the river. In the lands adjoining the river in my State where the caving process is most apparent I do not think that it would pay any farmer to revet it to protect his land. It would cost more to do the revetting than the land would be worth. Therefore, if he finds that there is danger of caving and his buildings are too close to the river, he simply moves them back and allows the cave-in to follow its natural course.

But I call the attention of the Senator to another photograph of the end of the Bismarck Bridge, one of the great international bridges just completed [exhibiting]. There are 6 miles of very low land, covered with rocks and sand, and which overflows at every overflow of the river. That land is not worth anything for tilling purposes and is worth scarcely anything for any other purpose. The only good that we ever got out of it so far was to cut the willows from it and use the willows and rocks for revetting. No one is going to put up revetments at the point which I have shown the Senator upon the photograph in order to protect the channel. The Government has got to do it or the Government is bound to lose the benefit of its bridge across the Missouri River, and then would have to build another bridge across the new Missouri River that would undoubtedly in a few years be running at least 3 or 4 miles from the present channel.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but he has been very generous in yielding. I want to ask one other question for information. In speaking of the bridges he referred to the protection which the proposed appropriation would give to Government property. What Government property is involved? Have the bridges been built by the United States Government?

Mr. McCUMBER. We have appropriated $150,000,000 a year for post roads, to be expended provided the States raise an equal amount. In the bridges across these great rivers the Government has a post road, has its half interest if it were measured by the amount of money it puts in, but has complete control over it as a State road.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think the Government has control of State roads?

Mr. McCUMBER. I say the Government has a right to control all the post roads of the country under its general law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes; but that does not mean that the Federal Government has control of the Federal-aid roads in the sense that it may do anything it wants with reference to them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; but it has the right to control them, and has its money invested in them for governmental advantages.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wonder if the Senator would give me some information on that point. The Government having put in its share in the building of the roads, including occasionally a bridge, although I think that is rather unusual—but it has been done in some instances, and undoubtedly was done in this instance—is it the Senator's idea that the Government should help maintain the bridge and the road?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is my idea that if the Missouri River cut through at another point, leaving high and dry that section where the present bridge is, and leaving the channel, perhaps 2 miles wide, at another section, the Government would be getting no benefit, and neither would the State be getting any benefit from it. If we are to have a bridge in that vicinity, we would then have to build another bridge across the river in the other section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the State spent any money at this point in the way of revetments?

Mr. McCUMBER. The State has done its part in the building of the bridge.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I mean in the revetment work.

Mr. McCUMBER. The State is not interested that I know of in the revetment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The State has a one-half interest in the bridge and has the entire obligation of maintaining it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not speaking now just with reference to the one bridge.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator used it as an illustration.

Mr. McCUMBER. The revetment I am asking for is for the purpose of maintaining a channel for navigation, and I am simply speaking of the bridge as it affects not only the channel for navigation but also protects the post roads in which the Government has an interest.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator tell us whether the State of North Dakota has appropriated any State funds for the purpose of revetments along the river to save the property of its own citizens?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not answer that question. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know whether the State of South Dakota has expended any State funds on revetments to save the property of its own citizens?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know; but the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] can undoubtedly answer the question.

Mr. STERLING. I can answer the question. I will say to the Senator from New York that I do not think the State of South Dakota has made any appropriation yet for that purpose, but I am not saying that it would not if it had the proper encouragement from the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the State of North Dakota has done some revetment work at the point of the bridge in order to protect the channel more or less at that point, undoubtedly, but just to what extent it has been done I do not know. That would be done, of course, in connection with the work of the Government. But remember all the time that all we are seeking is to maintain a channel for navigation. If the channel is cut through at the point I have mentioned, it would not be a channel that would be navigable. There would probably be water on both sides and that strip of country would be an island.

When the Northern Pacific placed its bridge, which the Senator will see in the photograph, just below the point where the cutting is going on to-day, it maintained dikes at that point to protect against the flow of the ice and the ice gorges and to protect against the cutting. Those who are acquainted with the Missouri River objected to the use of the dikes, saying that they would not and could not be effective. But the Government engineers—and the Government did part of the work there and expended part of the money—insisted upon the dikes. The dikes would have been all right had they gone down 1,700 feet to get a foundation of the blue clay. In other words, if they had gone down to the level of the Gulf of Mexico they could have built the dikes; but they built them upon sand, and when the floods and the winds came they were destroyed. Wherever they have done any reasonable amount of diking they have generally been quite successful in maintaining the channel in its place. It would require considerable diking at the point of the bridge to which I have referred, as it would require considerable at other points.

The Senator stated if there are landing places, the State should maintain the landing places. Upon the same theory the State of New York should pay the entire expense of maintaining the dikes and maintaining open channels, and the Federal Government should put in nothing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is mistaken. I did not mention landing places.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood the Senator to state that that is one of the places the State should take care of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I asked the Senator if the State, in the protection of its own highway bridge, had done any revetment work.

Mr. McCUMBER. We can not use our landing places unless we have the river maintained where it is now. We can not use the elevators and warehouses, which are built for holding coal and hay and grain, unless we are able to get up to them in boats. For that reason it is necessary to protect the channel. All I am asking in this instance is that, notwithstanding the prejudice of certain engineers who are located at Kansas City and whose only thought is deepening the channel between Kansas City and the mouth of the river, there shall be appropriated out of this sum a sufficient amount to keep our little boats of light draft going, by pulling out the snags and by revetting the shores where the channel is liable to change. It would help us and at the same time it would save very much of the cave-ins which are landed down near the mouth of the Missouri and which must be taken out there again.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Would not the Senator's policy, if I understand him correctly, involve upon the Federal Government the obligation of protecting the banks of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers from the source to the mouth?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; not unless the protection of a bank at a particular place was necessary in order to hold the channel in its proper place and make the river navigable. There would be no duty upon the Government to protect the adjoining lands. The duty would be simply that of keeping open the channel in the best way that it could be kept open. In my opinion the only way in some of these instances would be by proper revetments.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator, in view of the broad statement which he makes, if it is his contention that it is the duty of the Federal Government to make navigable every stream in the United States which may possibly be utilized for commerce purposes for a few boats or the floating down of a few logs, or what not?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; and I may say, Mr. President, that I have grave doubt of any great advantage that may come from the navigation of the Missouri River below Kansas City down to its mouth. There is where all of the money is being expended, although there is no commerce there to-day. So long as the Government is engaged in the policy of attempting to maintain commerce upon its inland rivers, I insist that it ought to expend some of its money where the commerce is and where it is likely to be for many years to come, for the grain that is moved by boats along the Missouri River and in Montana will not—at least during the Senator's lifetime, much less during my lifetime—be carried down to the Gulf of Mexico. It will be brought to the railroad intersections of the river and there continued as a shipment over the railways to Minneapolis, Duluth, Chicago, and other cities.

I think, Mr. President, I have in a general way explained why it is necessary that Congress should determine that some of the money proposed to be appropriated for rivers and harbors—fixing a definite amount—should be expended where the commerce is. If any Senator thinks that the amount which I have designated in the amendment is too great, I certainly should like to hear him upon that subject.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I always regret to have to oppose any amendment or any legislation which is sponsored by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, but I think this amendment, in the first place, might be subject to a point of order. I shall not, however, make the point. I have requested from the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] some citation of the authorization for this appropriation. The only thing he has been able to suggest is that there have been for a number of years incidental appropriations. The point I make is that this is not a project which has been authorized in the regular way by act of Congress, but I do not press that matter and do not make the point of order, for I think the Senate ought to determine the question on its merits.

Mr. President, if we are to adopt the policy of stating in connection with the appropriations for river and harbor purposes where the money shall be expended, we are going to be very quickly in a quagmire. If this amendment shall be adopted providing that $250,000 of this appropriation shall be expended in such and such a manner, then some other Senator will offer another amendment providing that one million of it shall be expended in such and such manner, and we shall find ourselves in inextricable confusion. I think the policy would be exceedingly bad. If this amendment shall be adopted, as one who is interested in the appropriation I shall feel it my duty to offer another amendment providing how certain other portions of the money shall be expended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator felt certain that the engineers would not use to exceed $14,000 or $15,000 on this 1,400 or 1,500 miles of the river, notwithstanding the necessity for a larger expenditure, would he be in favor of Congress saying that a sufficient amount—whatever that amount might be—should be used on that stretch of the river, notwithstanding the view of the engineers that they should use the entire amount below Kansas City?

Mr. WILLIS. I suppose in that case, situated as is the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, I would do just exactly as the Senator is doing, although I should not be able to do it with the great ability which he always manifests. I should try to make the fight for my people. I regret, however, that I can not agree with the view that the Senator has expressed. I am talking about the policy of this kind of legislation. I warn the Senate that if it shall adopt this amendment there will be other amendments, and very numerous amendments, offered providing just how portions of the aggregate appropriation shall be expended. That would be an overturning of the policy which heretofore has been adopted in connection with river and harbor appropriations.

I do not believe the Senate has the information which would enable it to determine without investigation what projects are the wise ones to be adopted. The policy which heretofore has obtained is that the subject is taken up in the Committee on Commerce, and certain projects are adopted, after the very fullest consideration. If we are now to overturn that practice and begin the policy of adopting projects here upon the floor of the Senate, I think it will be found that such a scheme of legislation will be exceedingly unsatisfactory.

As suggested by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the only justification for these appropriations, as I view them, is that they are going to be an aid to commerce.

I concede, of course, that the revetment of the banks of the Missouri River might be an indirect and inconsequential and somewhat speculative aid to commerce. If we should keep a wagonload of dirt from being washed into the Missouri River away up near its source somewhere, there would be one wagonload less of sand to take out down in the delta of the Mississippi River at some point; but I submit that that advantage would be rather remote and speculative. I doubt whether the Government ought to adopt a policy of the revetment of the banks of the Missouri River and the Mississippi River so as to protect the interests of navigation in the lower channel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question right there?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota, with pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should we provide that a certain amount of the $56,000,000, or whatever the sum may be, which is here proposed to be appropriated, shall be used on the Missouri River? Why should we not say that the $56,000,000 shall be used on rivers and harbors, without designating a particular river or a particular section of the country?

Mr. WILLIS. That is precisely what the pending bill does. The bill carries simply a lump-sum appropriation and does not designate where it shall be expended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the bill provide for the expenditure of $1,500,000 on the Missouri River?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIS. Not at all. The bill carries merely a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; but can not the Senator from Ohio see that we are wholly at the mercy of individuals who may combine projects or put everything into a project that would not have the approval of Congress? Can not the Senator understand that we ought to protect what little commerce we have rather than expend all of the money in a certain section of the country in order to protect some future commerce which we may hope to develop?

Mr. WILLIS. As the Senator from New York very properly suggests to me, the money proposed to be appropriated can only be expended for the projects that have been approved by legislation enacted by the Congress. What the Senator says of course is true in this respect, that we have got to follow either one or the other system. We can follow the present system of making an appropriation and leaving the expenditure of it to men who have made a lifetime study of the general subject of aids to commerce and navigation; that is the policy that we have now embarked upon; or we can follow the policy involved in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, cast to the winds the information already acquired, and, instead of permitting the men who have the scientific information to settle the question, settle it ourselves, and provide that there shall be so much appropriated for this project and so much for that project. I submit that the former method is better.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose we have found that by adopting the policy which the Senator mentions the money which has been expended year after year in certain sections of the country has been of no avail whatever, while in other sections where there is commerce that commerce has been greatly crippled by the application of that rule. Is it not time then that we should change the policy and use our judgment as to where the funds should be expended, rather than continue a policy under which money is expended where it is not needed, where it is not doing any good, and projects that would be of benefits to commerce are left entirely unprovided for?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, that is a question, of course, upon which the judgment of men will differ; but since the question has been fairly propounded I venture to say that the chief reason for the unwise expenditures that have been made heretofore has been the very policy of the amendment which the Senator now offers and defends.

While we are on that point I wish to say, Mr. President, that it seems to me that to get anywhere with the policy of internal improvements the money ought to be expended upon lines of transportation that begin somewhere and end somewhere. The same question is involved in expenditures for public roads. In a number of States public funds have been wasted because moneys have been expended for the reason that this interest or that Senator or that Representative or this community or that community have demanded that they should have a share, and as a result we have had roads constructed which began nowhere and ended nowhere. We have commenced to make progress only as we have adopted a system to construct great roads that really get somewhere. My notion is that the only way we are going to get very much good out of the improvement of rivers and harbors is by having a definite system. That system has been worked out by the Board of Army Engineers. Now it is proposed to take away from them that authority and to bring it back here into the Congress, where it shall be a matter of only cursory investigation on the floor of the Senate and the floor of the House. I think the policy is exceedingly unwise and that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota ought to be defeated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Ohio is in error in assuming that this is not a legalized project. I find in the report of the Chief of Engineers reference to the creation of this project under this title:

Existing project: This provides for the expenditure of from $75,000 to $150,000 yearly for five years in the removal of snags and rocks from the channel and in bank protection within easy boat reach of landings, towns, and railroad crossings between Sioux City, 807 miles above the mouth, and Fort Benton.

I also find in another portion of the same volume the creation of another project, having a similar purpose, from the mouth of the river up to Sioux City. So that in the past both of these stretches of the Missouri River have been incorporated into river projects for the purpose of maintenance of navigation. I think to that extent the Senator from North Dakota is warranted in claiming recognition and approval of these projects.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator, perhaps, misunderstands my contention. Of course I know that appropriations have been made for various individual improvements at various times running through many years, as pointed out by the Senator from Montana, but my contention has been and now is that this improvement has not been adopted as one of the authorized projects by any act of Congress. I have not had time to hunt up the statutes, but I have requested that that be done, and thus far no one has been able to cite the authority. I do not concede from the information I have that it is an authorized project, but I do not urge that point; I am talking about the question of policy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The project was duly established in both cases—I think there is no doubt about that—but now I ask the Senator from North Dakota why he specifies in his amendment the stretch of river from Sioux City to Fort Benton? I might have been seduced into supporting this amendment if the Senator had incorporated the stretch of river from Kansas City to Sioux City, because I might feel that my constituents had a personal interest in the matter, placing myself in the same attitude that the Senator from North Dakota does, but the Senator specifies—

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator, if he will allow me. I will answer him by saying, as the Senator from Ohio said a short time ago, that in all of these projects the money ought to be expended for something that begins somewhere and ends somewhere. I am in absolute agreement with the Senator from Ohio in that statement. The only real commerce to-day upon the Missouri River begins at Fort Benton and ends at Sioux City, Iowa; and that is the reason why I ask that this proportion of the sum should be expended in that stretch, and all the rest—any amount they want to expend—below Sioux City. The engineers at Kansas City have always been favorable to those projects below Sioux City and below Kansas City, and I considered that they would take care of that without any question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am in some sympathy with what the Senator says in criticism of the policy which makes such large appropriations for the stretch of the Missouri River from Kansas City down to the mouth, a distance of about 400 miles, and such small appropriations for the stretch of river above Kansas City; but the Senator, I think, will have difficulty in justifying his statement that the chief commerce on the Missouri River is above Sioux City. According to the testimony before the committee in the House and according to the report made by the War Department, the commerce in 1921 on the Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton was 9,164 tons, whereas the commerce between Kansas City and Sioux City—

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say that in that year and for two years there was an entire failure of crops along that section of the country and, as I stated when I opened the debate this morning, the commerce was almost nil during 1920 and 1921.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator state what the present commerce is? What is the tonnage?

Mr. McCUMBER. I could not tell the Senator; but I asked the captain of one of the boats, and he said that his line of boats would handle this year about three-quarters of a million bushels of wheat alone, besides the coal and other articles of commerce.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I only know what figures are given in our public documents. According to them, the tonnage north of Sioux City on the Missouri was 9,000 tons, and the tonnage from Kansas City to Sioux City, which passes the great city of Omaha, was 110,000 tons; but I want to justify what the Senator says in criticism of the policy which has made the appropriations for the Missouri River almost exclusively from Kansas City to the mouth of the river, some 400 miles farther down. There, with a commerce amounting to only 139,000 tons, they have appropriated something like a million dollars a year recently; and they now propose to use a million dollars a year for improvement and $500,000 a year for maintenance, although the tonnage from Kansas City to the mouth of the Missouri where it empties into the Mississippi, is only 20,000 tons greater than it is from Kansas City to Sioux City; so that the appropriations do not appear to be based upon the plan of recognizing and promoting commerce but upon some arbitrary rule which the engineers have established for themselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator said the commerce was 20,000 tons greater; but if he will examine the cargoes he will find that those many thousands of tons are nothing but sand that is dug out for building purposes along the Missouri.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There, again, I am not able to state, because I only have the figures; but, according to the figures, the commerce, as reported by the Government officials—the very same officials who allot the money—is practically as important from Kansas City up to Sioux City as it is from Kansas City to the mouth of the river where it empties into the Mississippi. So I sympathize with what the Senator says—that there appears to have been a sort of blindness afflicting the engineers when they considered the project north of Kansas City, which has led them to devote practically all of the Missouri River appropriations to the stretch below Kansas City.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not certain that I am accurate in my understanding of this situation, but, judging from the testimony of General Taylor, I gathered the very distinct impression that from Kansas City to the mouth the project was a definitely adopted project, with a total expenditure estimated at $20,000,000—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And apparently it was the purpose and intent of the Congress at that time to spend $2,000,000 a year on that project for 10 years, until it was finished, at a total cost of $20,000,000. Of course, they have not spent much more than a million dollars in any one year; but I think that will explain why it is that the engineers have spent so much more below Kansas City than above. They were, in effect, directed to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is possible, and I am not now complaining, and I do not propose to offer an amendment to expend money on the stretch where the river washes Nebraska. I have not much faith in those appropriations; and I think the Senator from North Dakota, if he got an appropriation ten times as large as the existing appropriation, would be disappointed in the result. I have a good deal of doubt whether in these railroad days the Missouri River can be converted again to what it once was—a navigable stream. I remember that when I was a boy great flat-bottomed boats went up and down the Missouri River and carried a large commerce; but the advent of the railroad has practically driven those boats out of existence, and it is more the railroad competition than it is the unnavigability of the river that has wiped off that commerce. I doubt whether we can restore commerce to rivers of this sort unless we adopt the German method of enforcing a rule by which certain commerce shall go on rivers and shall not be carried on the railroads. So that I have not much faith in the merit of dumping money into the Missouri River if it is proposed that the appropriation be increased along the stretch of the river with which I am familiar.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to agree with the Senator that I have not much faith in the Missouri ever being a great thoroughfare; but there are certain stretches between the great continental lines where there will be boats running for the benefit of the grain and the coal and hay, and so forth, where they can be, as I have explained, sorts of extensions of the railroad lines. That is where the commerce has been for the last twenty-odd years, and there is where, in my opinion, it will be for the next 50 years, at least; and it is to help that commerce that I think we ought to provide that a sufficient amount should be expended that the commerce might be continued. If the Senator thinks I have made my limitation on the miles to be covered by this appropriation too short, and if he thinks that it ought to go down as far as Omaha, which is not very far below Sioux City, I have not the slightest objection to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not asking that, Mr. President. I have had pressure brought to bear on me by my constituents who think the Missouri River can be benefited by large appropriations, and, as a rule, I have not favored them. I know that the real motive for people along the Missouri River desiring appropriations by the Government is a real-estate proposition, just as the Senator from North Dakota has practically admitted. The river does cut into the shores; it does take off parts of farms; it does cause local loss; and if Congress could lawfully undertake the work of putting a stop to that on those rivers I should be in favor of the appropriations to do so, although I think it would result in enormous undertakings by the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator will not say that I have admitted that, because I have stated, to the contrary, that, so far as the landowners in my State are concerned, none of them has taken the slightest interest in the matter, and I did not believe that they would receive a sufficient protection to justify any expenditure at all. I simply stated that it ought to be done entirely for the purposes of navigation and without any regard whatever to any interest of any adjoining landowner.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is all that can be done legally under our form of government. Congress has not any right, under any constitutional provision, to undertake to protect the owners of riparian land against damage. All that Congress can do under the Constitution is to promote navigation; but we have used that fiction very largely to protect and assist local interests, and I am afraid it has been done a good deal in this bill, and done a good deal down South in the States that have suffered from the inroads of the Mississippi River, for which the Missouri River is partly responsible. So I do not favor the Senator's amendment, and I do not even desire to offer to incorporate in it that part of the Missouri River in which I might be interested.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a few words relative to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I am in hearty sympathy with the amendment, and I hope it will prevail.

Mr. President, I am not here to argue that within a couple of hundred miles northwest of Sioux City and on the Missouri River there is now any great amount of commerce. It might be termed inconsequential, so far as that is concerned. I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that farther north, and as the Missouri River courses through his State of North Dakota, there is more river commerce than there is farther south. But, Mr. President, I am here to contend that every piece of revetment work on the Missouri River, while it will protect the banks from erosion and save valuable farms from being washed into the river, is at the same time directly in the interest of commerce and navigation wherever that revetment work may be placed.

These very Army engineers who have insisted upon a different policy, and who have objected, as I think they have from time to time, to revetment work along the Missouri River because it was not in the interest of commerce and navigation, have themselves said that the Missouri River carries down into the Mississippi River 400,000,000 tons of silt annually; and it follows that if that amount of silt is carried by the Missouri into the Mississippi River it impairs navigation, it interferes with commerce, and is the justification for the expenditure of many millions of dollars in the improvement of the Mississippi River. So, Mr. President, in the interest of commerce and navigation on the Mississippi, as well as on the Missouri, the amendment here proposed is justifiable.

Annually snag boats are sent out to pull the snags from the Missouri River. I heard of a little incident which happened a few years ago. A snag boat was making its annual journey up the river and a few miles to the northwest of Vermilion pulled from the bank of the river a tree to which some revetment work had been fastened, or lashed, by farmers who were endeavoring to save their land by building a little revetment work of their own. The captain, looking out from the deck of the boat, saw the tree and thought that the banks would erode and the tree would be washed into the river within a year or so, and that as a measure of precaution he would have it taken out, so he summoned the crew, and it was taken out, and the revetment work which these farmers had tried to construct on their own account was destroyed by this effort of the people managing the snag boat.

We see need of this work in a very plain way at the city of Yankton, 26 miles from my own home town. The people there by private subscriptions and donations have built across the Missouri River a bridge for railroad purposes, and for wagon-road purposes as well, and on the south of the bridge there is great danger that the approaches may be washed away because of the erosion of the banks at that place by the Missouri River. Some revetment work upon the shore would protect those banks, and if not directly in the interest of commerce and navigation it would be directly in the interest of interstate commerce, because if the bridge is destroyed commerce over the bridge between the citizens of Nebraska and the citizens of South Dakota of course will fall with it.

I hope no narrow view will be taken of this proposition. The proper place to begin the improvement of the Missouri River, with commerce and navigation as the great end in view, is nearer the source and up the stream, rather than beginning down and dredging out year after year what is carried down the stream the year before, interfering with navigation there, and causing or helping to cause, in great degree, the overflow of the banks and the destruction of the farms along the Mississippi River below the mouth of the Missouri.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. KING. We have expended more than a hundred million dollars to date upon the Mississippi River. I want to ask the Senator whether he believes the results, viewed from any standpoint, have warranted the great expenditures which have been made by the Government of the United States?

Mr. STERLING. I am not to say as to that quite, Mr. President. I do not know but that those expenditures have been warranted from year to year; but there would not have been the necessity for those expenditures if the proper improvements had been made on the Missouri River farther north.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that just in proportion as we have expended money there has been a diminution in the amount of commerce upon the river. As stated by the Senator from Nebraska a moment ago, when he was a boy a large number of flat-bottomed boats plied up and down the Mississippi River and the Missouri River, and we know that Mark Twain has described with great felicity the boats which were used upon the Mississippi River in his days.

There was much passenger traffic and a considerable amount of tonnage carried up and down the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers; but now, after we have expended nearly $150,000,000 upon the two rivers, there is scarcely any traffic. There is perhaps a little up in the State of the Senator from North Dakota, perhaps ten or eleven thousand tons last year. Out in my State and in the other States in the West the little mining streams could float down more than that, and some of the little mines would carry upon their railroads twenty-five to forty thousand tons a day. We do not ask Government subsidies or aid of that character.

Mr. STERLING. There is yet considerable traffic, I think, on the Mississippi River, and along the river where such vast expenditures have been made for the improvement of the river; not great, we may say, in comparison with the traffic of the country generally or with the traffic carried by the railroads, but yet considerable traffic; and I would not favor a policy which would dispense with the improvement of our great waterways, like the Mississippi, like the Missouri, like the Ohio Rivers. Though the traffic may not at the present time be so great, I think it is essential to keep these rivers improved. There are great potentialities in keeping those waterways open for commerce and navigation.

So I think we ought to take this broader view: That we should not think now as to whether this little revetment work here and there, revetment work at the bridge at Bismarck, revetment work elsewhere along the Missouri River, in North Dakota or South Dakota, is going to help navigation and commerce right at those points. The question is whether it will improve the river and save the vaster expenditures which will be required further on down the river and in the Mississippi River.

Just a word in conclusion. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is not a great sum for the improvements contemplated—the improvements which are needed now—and even though we should reduce this total appropriation from $56,000,000 to $37,000,000, I am inclined to think we yet ought to have, and we are justified in asking, the $250,000 provided in this amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am in great sympathy with this improvement, and I hope the engineers may make very generous allotments for the work. I have some familiarity with the value of the suggested work. I know that one of the best ways to preserve the navigability of our streams is to protect the banks from the erosive effects of water. It is not a new idea. It is a proper form for our expenditures to take in the way of protecting the navigability of our navigable streams. It is practiced in the Columbia River, the Sacramento River, the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers, and the Ohio River. So I differ with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] when he says that the money should not be expended in that manner.

I think it is one of the most effective methods, and I know something of the commerce on this stream. I know what effect it has had on keeping freight rates down. It is something we can not measure in figures, though the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] wants to know if a certain appropriation brings back to the Government a certain amount of money. No one can tell mathematically.

I must oppose this amendment, though I regret exceedingly to have to do so, on account of the form rather than the sum of money carried. I think it is a departure in legislation which is unfortunate. Heretofore, and I should say until two or three years ago, Congress appropriated money in river and harbor bills for specific, enumerated projects, and the sums were placed after the names of the projects, but since 1918, as I recall the year, Congress has seen fit to appropriate lump sums, leaving to the judgment of the engineers the amount of money to be expended on particular projects. I think that has worked very well. There is nothing in this bill carrying this lump sum which would prevent the War Department, working through their Board of Engineers, from expending $250,000 on this very work.

Mr. McCUMBER (in his seat). They will not do it.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator says in a mild voice that they will not do it. I do not know anything about that, and I am inclined to think he does not know. I have known lump-sum appropriations to be made, and the department to come to the committee of Congress having charge of the matter with an estimate of an amount they would like to spend on various projects, but when they get into the work they use much less on one project and much more on another. So, if the Senator, with his great influence and power as a public official and an able Senator, would go with the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], or let anyone go, and show the merits of this improvement, I have no doubt but that the Board of Engineers would allot to this improvement the sum of $250,000.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. As I sought to point out in the few remarks that I made, the trouble is that the question with the engineers will be as to whether it will improve commerce and navigation at that particular point. That is the question the engineers raise. But, as I tried to show, there is a broader question than that. The question is whether commerce and navigation will be helped elsewhere—not necessarily at that point, but elsewhere—and the engineers, it seems to me, have overlooked that fact.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the whole thing is out now in the light. The Senator from South Dakota, capable and able as he is, desires to direct by legislation what the engineers shall do. Upon that point we differ. I say that is a policy which is not practical and not wise.

Mr. STERLING. I think where they take the entirely opposite view it is wise and it is just for Congress to say what they should do. That is the very point here.

Mr. McNARY. How can Congress tell what is wise and just and proper to do? When a bill is brought up in the morning some Senator offers an amendment which has never been considered by a committee or by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and which is in direct conflict with the ideas of the engineers, skilled in that line of work, and the Senator, in a 15-minute speech, attempts to show Congress, the Members of which have never seen the river, that we should increase an appropriation because, in his humble opinion, it should be done. Is that the way legislation should be fashioned in this body? It is just to avoid such things that we appropriate the money in lump sums.

I would go a long way to help my fellow Senators get this appropriation for this project, which I think is an important one; but I can not see the wisdom of this practice, and I do not want to see established the precedent of designating particular projects in a bill carrying a lump sum. This is not the first time it has been tried. Such an attempt failed in the consideration of the last Agricultural appropriation bill. There was an item in that appropriation bill carrying, as I recall it, $502,000 for the destruction of predatory animals, and a very distinguished Senator from the West offered an amendment providing that $150,000 of that sum should be expended in a particular State. The conferees considered it only lightly.

We can not come here and say we will appropriate a certain sum of money, based upon the judgment of the engineers, and then adopt one amendment or a dozen amendments which specify particular projects. If we start in that fashion, every Senator who has a project in his State, every Senator who wants an increase, will attack the estimate of the Board of Engineers and propose an appropriation. Suppose I should come in and want to add an appropriation to improve the Columbia River by a system of revetments such as they are using on that river advantageously. Would the Senator from North Dakota say I was justified, simply because I thought the sum to be appropriated was larger than the sum estimated by the Board of Engineers? Shall we obtrude our individual opinions against those of skilled men who make a life study of that work?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McNARY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. STERLING. Suppose the engineers had decided upon some revetment work on the Columbia River, or suppose they would not put any revetment work at any place where they should, and they continually held to that policy and refused to do any revetment work. Would the Senator feel justified in coming to Congress and asking Congress to correct the situation?

Mr. McNARY. There it goes again. I do not put up my ability as an engineer against the ability and skill of Army engineers who have practiced their profession for a lifetime. I might think there ought to be 400 pieces of revetment work on the Columbia River, when there were only 40 actually needed. I would not have the hardihood to come to Congress and ask that my judgment be substituted by legislation for the judgment of experienced engineers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. In the illustration given by the Senator, would any committee think of overturning the report of the engineers without a full consideration by the committee and having the engineers before it to give it information as to the reasons for its action?

Mr. McNARY. I certainly would not proceed in that manner.

Mr. LENROOT. Would any committee of Congress make a recommendation that an adverse report of the engineers be thrown aside and affirmative action taken without a consideration of the matter in the committee at all?

Mr. McNARY. I do not think so. I know of a case in Oregon where a new project was desired and I offered a proposition in the form of an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill. I went before the committee. The engineers appeared before the committee. The matter was presented fully to the committee and finally reported, and the item was carried in the bill. But the objection I urge in a feeble way against the policy attempted to be inaugurated by the Senator from North Dakota is that that course is not pursued in this instance.

In conclusion, I again say that I regret exceedingly I find it necessary to speak against the project, because I know the money ought to be expended to the full amount, and I would join in any movement to bear upon the engineers so that they might give a more sympathetic expression in the matter.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in reply, and it is suggested by the question asked by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The Senator from Wisconsin inquired as to what we would do or what we would not do with reference to the report of the engineers. Under ordinary circumstances of course we would say, "Let us have, and perhaps follow, the report of the engineers." But we are familiar now, I think, with the established policy of the Army engineers in regard to these projects and these particular questions of improvement. We know what they have determined upon, and we know that the underlying principle by which they are guided is as to whether a particular piece of improvement or piece of revetment work would benefit commerce and navigation at that place. That is the principle which they follow. We are trying to insist upon their following another policy.

As I said, the policy advocated by the Army engineers is well known. It is competent for Congress, knowing that is the policy of the board, to determine upon another policy. That is what the amendment seeks to do. The amendment calls for the expenditure of $250,000, mostly in revetment work, of course, between Sioux City and Fort Benton, a distance of 1,500 miles.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. STERLING. It is all in the interest of commerce and navigation. Of course, it would directly help the farmers who are having some of the best farm land in the world washed into the Missouri River. It would help them in that way. But we know we can not get an appropriation on that ground alone. It must be in the interest of commerce and navigation, and we are contending that it is.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator admits, then, that this would be a new departure, that if the amendment should be adopted it would establish a new policy touching the matter and would overthrow a policy which upon full consideration has been adopted by the Government?

Mr. STERLING. No; I am not quite admitting that. It is asking for a specific amount out of the lump-sum appropriation of $56,000,000 for this particular purpose. We used to call it all a project. As I remember, the old appropriation measures called it a project from Sioux City to Fort Benton and appropriated so much money for that project.

Let me give the Senator an illustration: Just before I came to the Senate an appropriation of $75,000 had been made for revetment work at the town of Elk Point, 15 miles from my home town. That revetment work stands there to-day. It has probably saved the town as well as many farms adjacent the town. It has helped commerce and navigation to the extent that just that much less silt is carried down into the Mississippi River. That is true of every piece of revetment work placed along the Missouri River. That is what we are contending for in this instance.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. STERLING. We can not get it through the Board of Engineers, but it is for Congress to determine whether we shall pursue that policy. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I have been absent from the Chamber during a portion of the discussion, but I would like to ask the Senator from South Dakota as to how much commerce is carried upon the upper Missouri River?

Mr. STERLING. I can not say, though I think it is considerable. I rely more on the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] in regard to that feature, but I understand there is a great deal of commerce carried there.

Mr. LENROOT. A great deal? Of course, it is set forth exactly in the report. The Senators proposing this must be familiar with what is done there.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator, if he desires me to do so. I talked with the captain of one of the boats in Bismarck and he told me the amount of commerce carried in his boats. I do not know what other boats there are there—

Mr. LENROOT. I know, but—

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator asked me the question, and I would like to answer it. The captain stated that this year they would carry about 750,000 bushels of wheat and that all the boats of his line were capable of carrying about 1,000,000 bushels. He also stated that on account of the total failure of crops for about three years last past the commerce in the upper Missouri had been very little.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the report of the engineers shows what the commerce has been from Sioux City to Fort Benton and shows that it was 9,164 tons for 1921. Whether the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] admits it or not, if the amendment is adopted it would change the whole character of the bill; it would change the whole policy which we have adopted since 1919, because if the amendment were adopted other Senators would suggest other amendments to take care of particular projects here and there all over the country, and it would make of the bill the old-time rivers and harbors appropriation proposition, where the Commerce Committee handled it in the Senate and the Rivers and Harbors Committee handled it in the House, taking care of the whole measure from the adoption of the project to the making of the appropriation, inclusive.

In 1919 we adopted the policy of making a lump-sum appropriation and allowing the engineers to expend the money where it was most needed. They set out in their report what their recommendations would be and where they think the money ought to go. But I take it that if any project that needs attention was laid before them and their minds directed to it, they would not be bound absolutely to every item mentioned in the estimates which they have furnished. They could use part of the fund for the purpose of taking care of an emergency condition or a condition that was meritorious in their judgment. I am inclined to believe that if they saw fit, after the appropriation was made as called for in the bill, they could allot a certain amount of the appropriation to take care of the matter in which the Senators seem so much interested between Sioux City and Fort Benton. If they saw fit to do it, if they thought it wise and proper to do it, they could allot a certain amount of the lump-sum appropriation for that purpose.

But to specify in the bill that so much of the money shall be used on that particular stretch of the river is to change the whole character from that of a lump-sum appropriation to that of a general rivers and harbors bill taking care of specific projects, because other amendments would follow, and, as I said, we would revert back to the old policy and abandon the policy of lump-sum appropriations entirely.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to have the opinion of the Senator from Florida touching certain language in the amendment which has not yet been referred to. If he has the amendment before him, he will observe in it this language:

The revetment of shores where the same may be necessary, and for the maintenance of the channel to landing places and at points where the railroads intersect the Missouri River.

What special reason can there be for providing for revetment of the shores at the specific points where the railroads intersect the river?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course that is clearly beyond the province of Congress, which is to appropriate money for the purpose of promoting navigation. It is not a question of navigation. It seems to be a question of protecting the railroads or railroad bridges. That is entirely aside from any power of Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of promoting navigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct what is entirely a misapprehension?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator had given attention to my statement, he would have remembered that I stated that the commerce on the upper Missouri was in all cases between the great continental railways brought down to a point where such railways join with the stream. There is where the warehouses are; there is where the elevators are; there is where the landing places are; and having a channel at the landing place is for the purpose of navigation. Here it is supposed that a landing place is for the benefit of the railways, but I have never heard that the railways are interested one way or the other, except in the matter of protecting themselves.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not charge that, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. The reason why we covered the point is to show in the amendment itself that the navigation is in connection with the railways. Commerce is brought, for instance, all the way from near Williston, in North Dakota, where the Great Northern line crosses, all the way down to Bismarck, where there are a number of elevators. The boats come up and take the grain at the elevators and take it down to the Northern Pacific, where the Northern Pacific crosses the Missouri, and there it is loaded into cars and goes to Minneapolis and Duluth. That is the only connection the railways have with the matter in this case.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, clearly, in my judgment, the amendment ought not to be adopted for the reasons I have stated. It would violate the principle upon which the appropriation is based. From 1919 to 1922 we did not adopt a new project, but in 1922 we did pass a bill providing for a new project. We have continued the policy, however, of lump-sum appropriations notwithstanding the passage of the bill in 1922, and only a part of those projects adopted in 1922 will receive any portion of the appropriations provided here.

It might be well to give a better understanding of the theory upon which the appropriation is made and the purposes and uses to which the money is to be put, by referring to General

Taylor's statement before the committee. On page 162 the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], asked General Taylor:

Tell us something about the situation.

This is what General Taylor said in reply, and I hope it will be borne in mind because it bears on the whole question relating not only to the pending amendment but to similar amendments which may be proposed. General Taylor said:

The situation, briefly, Mr. Chairman, is this: During the war the work ran very much behind, like lots of other work, and we have been gradually catching up. Last year we had a good-sized appropriation, and we have done a great deal of work with that. Congress, in the river and harbor act of September 22, 1922, adopted 35 new projects. To carry on the work authorized by those projects for the next year will require $13,000,000. The maintenance of our old works will require $13,000,000 more, and that will be a total of $26,000,000—twenty-six and one-half millions, in round numbers.

Mind you, we had not been adopting projects for some years past, and the work had fallen, as General Taylor says, very much behind. The engineers have recommended some 200 projects in the years past, but they have not been taken care of. The war was on; we did not favor large appropriations, but tried to keep all expenditures down to the narrowest limits, not only in reference to rivers and harbors but as to other public works. It will be remembered that we have had no general public buildings bill since March, 1913. We were disposed to keep down those appropriations, as I have stated, to the very lowest point. So we passed over from year to year the 200 projects which have been surveyed and estimates for which have been put in and recommended by the engineers, until finally, in September, 1922, we adopted 35; we picked out the very choicest and most needed and most commanding as to necessity for improvement—35 projects out of the 200. General Taylor continues:

To carry on the work authorized by those projects for the next year will require $13,000,000.

That is one of the items covered by the bill—an appropriation of $13,000,000 to begin work on the projects which were adopted in 1922. General Taylor goes on to say:

The maintenance of our old works will require $13,000,000—

That is mere maintenance. Two items in the estimates with reference to the Missouri River include $25,000 for maintenance from Kansas City to Sioux City, and from Sioux City to Fort Benton, $15,000. Those two items will be taken care of under this appropriation as estimated by the engineers.

The maintenance of our old works will require $13,000,000 more, and that will be a total of $26,000,000—twenty-six and one-half millions, in round numbers.

That means that of this entire appropriation $26,500,000 will go merely to the maintenance of old works, not to continuing improvements, and the beginning of work on 35 new projects which were adopted in 1922.

General Taylor further says:

To carry on the work of the other projects we cut the amounts down as much as we could, and the report shows the amount that can be profitably expended on all the works, including the new work adopted by the September, 1922, act.

Senator WADSWORTH. Is it necessary, in your judgment, to start work on all the 35 new projects immediately?

General TAYLOR. Those projects, Mr. Chairman, were selected from probably 200 or 300 projects which were before Congress, all with favorable recommendations, and they were selected after very full and careful hearings as being projects upon which work should be started immediately. I think there is no question but that work should be started immediately on all of them.

Senator SPENCER. We had not had any new projects adopted for some years?

General TAYLOR. Not since 1919.

Senator JONES. I might say here that the Commerce Committee asked the War Department, before we entered into consideration of the bill, to study the proposed new projects very carefully, so as to be prepared to recommend to Congress those that they considered really vital to our commercial needs and asked them to submit such as they did consider of particular vital importance for early commencement, and it was upon that theory that the legislative act that adopted these new projects was framed and passed.

General TAYLOR. I would like to add to what Senator JONES said, that in reply to the Commerce Committee's inquiry we divided the projects into two classes, those that were of first importance and those that were of secondary importance, and that the Commerce Committee selected out of those of first importance only a small portion of the projects, so they did not adopt by any means all of those that we recommended as being of great importance.

Senator SPENCER. That is, those 35 new projects are only a small number of the first-class projects that in your judgment require immediate attention?

General TAYLOR. That is correct. I can mention a few of them.

Then he proceeds to mention them. Under the appropriation of $56,000,000 proposed in the bill, $13,000,000 must go to the beginning of work on the 35 new projects which were selected out of the 200 or 300 projects which had been recommended by the Board of Engineers as being of prime importance. Then $13,000,000 of the appropriation must go to the maintenance of old projects. That leaves about $30,000,000 to be applied toward continuing improvements on projects which have been under way for some years, some of which will be completed by this time next year, so that the next bill will in all probability not be so large as is this bill, because, as I have stated, some of these projects will be completed out of this fund and will be ended, and that will finally dispose of them. They are old projects which have been under way for years, but have not yet been completed. We have $30,000,000 in this bill for the completion of a good many of these old projects and nearly to complete others.

The present method of appropriating for rivers and harbors has been in the mind of Congress for the last few years. I have not always agreed with it. I would rather see the old-time practice of having a river and harbor bill considered by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, projects adopted, and appropriations made to take care of the items specified in the bill, and have such a bill come here and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate act upon it and report it, and have the Senate act upon it, specifying each project and each appropriation. That plan, however, has been abandoned for several years, and we have got to the basis of a lump-sum appropriation, having been driven to it partially by the exigencies which arose during the World War. We have adopted that principle, and that is the principle which is involved here. If Senators undertake to offer amendments which will specify how much of the money or what portions of it shall be appropriated on each project, we shall change the whole basis of the appropriation and introduce another principle.

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire of the Senator from Florida, who is to determine how much of the money shall be spent on any particular project?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is left to the Army engineers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it left to their discretion as to the amount which it is necessary to spend on any particular project?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. That is true in a broad sense, of course, but as to a number of the projects which were adopted in previous years we specified the total cost. That has been understood. Those projects are to be finished within a certain time, and, from the engineers' report, we know exactly what is going to be required in order to complete those projects. The engineers are bound, therefore, to apply the appropriations to the completion of the particular work where it has been adopted by Congress with the idea of completing the work within a certain time; but, broadly speaking, the expenditure of this money is left to the discretion of the engineers. They know what work may be prosecuted profitably and wisely; they can not spend any money on any project that has not been adopted by Congress; they must expend it where Congress has authorized it to be expended, but they make the allotment to meet the needs of particular conditions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Army engineers can not expend more on a project than it was estimated it would cost to complete it as adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In other words, they can only spend within the limit of the amount authorized for the approved project.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; but out of the total sum appropriated they make the allotment where necessary to complete a project.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do they give notice as to the allotments and when hearings are to be held in connection with the allotments to be made? Is there any way by which we may be advised as to how it is done?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. The Senator will find a statement in the hearings before the subcommittee of the House of Representatives, and the report of the engineers also furnishes that information. In the hearings on the War Department appropriation bill for 1924, on the subject of nonmilitary activities, part 2, at page 890, will be found an itemized statement of the engineers which will figure up what they recommended at that time. From that statement the Senator can see what projects they have in mind as calling for various amounts under the sum appropriated in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand, however, they are not bound by the recommendation but they can spend within the limit of appropriation any amount they conclude to be wise on a given project.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think they are not absolutely bound; they can vary the amount, so that if conditions arise under which more ought to be expended on a particular project they may expend it.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that it is left to their discretion. I may say that I do not see how under the circumstances the work could be accomplished in any other way, provided they are honest, as I have no doubt they are.

Mr. FLETCHER. It appears to be the only feasible way to proceed. They know the conditions of the work. They know, for instance, in certain localities they can not do work in the wintertime at all, so that they must work somewhere else; that in some localities the need is not as great as it is in certain other localities, and that economies may be effected by completing a certain project now and not waiting, and so forth. All such matters are considered by the engineers, when they make the allotment to carry out the purpose of the Congress, in order to accomplish the greatest results at the least cost to the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, to what extent in past years have they carried out suggested projects?

Mr. FLETCHER. Quite generally, I think, they have followed the list that was furnished by them to Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will yield, I should like to say that I wrote to General Taylor and received from him an estimate of the proposed expenditures, which will answer in some detail the question asked by the Senator from North Carolina. The appropriation proposed by the pending bill is $56,589,910. That appropriation is designed to provide for various improvements under four different heads suggested by the engineers. For instance, the first item is principal seacoast harbors. To take care of the various seacoast harbors under projects already adopted, according to the information furnished me, will take $19,683,410. We merely appropriate the money, and the engineers consider that the most important expenditure from that appropriation is the item of $19,683,410 to take care of the improvement of the seacoast harbors. Now, the next item—

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion there, the engineers also add for maintaining those principal seacoast harbors $7,375,400.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the aggregate for maintenance and improvement is $19,683,410.

Mr. RANDELL. I beg the Senator's pardon. The two sums must be added together.

Mr. SWANSON. They are added together in the total I have given, as I understand.

Mr. RANDELL. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator is mistaken as to that. For improvement the item is $19,683,410 and for maintenance $7,375,400.

Mr. SWANSON. I see the Senator is correct. For maintenance there is an estimate of $7,375,400.

The next heading is "Secondary harbors and coastwise channels." Of course, in their second list they consider the cost of taking care of these, naming specifically the projects and the pages of the report on which you can find out what is said in connection with each project. They will take for improvement $7,860,900 and for maintenance $1,509,600. That takes care of that class of work, as I understand.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. The next most important work is the Lake harbors and channels. The great commerce on the Lakes ought to be taken care of; and, as I understand, in this estimate they furnish to me they itemize the places, the pages of the report where each one can be found, the reasons why they recommend it, and the work done. For improvement they estimate $1,726,000 and for maintenance $1,450,800.

The next consideration is the principal rivers, which work has been very much retarded. They name the river, they give the pages of this report where you can find when the project was established, the amount which has been expended on it, the commerce there, the necessity for it, and the reasons are given. To take care of the principal rivers they estimate $13,726,000 for improvement, and for maintenance $2,249,000. All those projects have been estimated and some of them maintained to completion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, has the Senator a list of them there?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be interesting if the Senator would read the list and give the amount in the case of each river.

Mr. SWANSON. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that that is all set forth in the hearings before the House committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it ought to go in the RECORD just the same.

Mr. SWANSON. This gives the pages of the report where each one is found.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not so much interested in having that in the Record as I am in having it stated here. It seems to me it would be very enlightening, as going to show the necessity of this appropriation. I should like to know myself what rivers there are and how much was spent on each one.

Mr. SWANSON. In the case of the secondary rivers in connection with the large rivers like the Mississippi and Ohio and others an estimate is given of the amount required for them, the names of the rivers, the amounts, the pages of the report where the survey can be seen, and the amount of commerce, from which we can reach a conclusion as to whether or not the commerce is sufficient to justify the expenditure. The aggregate of that is $181,820—

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield in a few minutes.

Those are the secondary rivers. The aggregate of the secondary rivers, as I understand, is $181,820 for improvement—that is all that is to be spent on these secondary rivers—and, for maintenance, $826,980.

The aggregate of this $56,000,000 is made up as follows: For the principal seacoast harbors, $19,683,410; for the secondary harbors and coastwise channels, $7,860,900; for lake harbors and channels, $1,726,000; for the principal rivers, $13,726,000; for the secondary rivers—which has been to some extent criticized—only $181,820 is appropriated; total, for improvements, $43,178,130.

For the maintenance of projects that are already in existence, and that must be maintained to keep up the present status, there is an estimate of $13,411,780, which, added to the improvement and the maintenance, makes a grand total of $56,589,910, which is the amount carried in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish the Senator would put all of that statement in the Record.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator from Florida object to having it put in the Record?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask to have this statement included in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be inserted in the Record.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have heard so much criticism of river and harbor bills, and it has been charged so often that there was a "pork barrel" connected with it, that I have taken occasion in the case of some of these rivers that I did not know about to look and see the commerce, the amount expended, and so forth, and I can not see where there is any waste of money in any of the projects that I have examined. Of course, I could not examine all of them, but if the Senator will take some one project, instead of speaking in a general way, and examine that project, the amount of commerce, the accommodation of the people, and the amount expended for what little work we have done in the past, I think he will agree with me that this is a very reasonable expenditure at this time.

I have examined especially some of the rivers included in the list of secondary rivers. I find a great many of these where it is impossible to build roads, where there are no railroads, where the people would not have any means of transportation at all unless there were transportation by water. The Government spends money for roads. If it were a section of the country where we had to have a road built by the State and Federal governments in cooperation, it would cost a great deal more than it would cost to improve these rivers. They are the only means of transportation in these sections.

Instead of making a general attack on this bill, I wish Senators would look at the various items, the amounts appropriated, the records of the engineers, the surveys, the estimate of the amounts required for maintenance, the number of people interested, the commerce that exists at present and what will be engendered in the future. In the light of those things, it seems to me that this is a very wise expenditure of money, and it seems to me that most of the measures that were the subject of criticism and adverse comment heretofore have been eliminated from this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator. I had just about finished what I had to say, but if the Senator wants to ask a question, I will yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], in his interruption, has suggested several things that are interesting and that I think ought to be presented in a more detailed way than he has presented them. To say that so many millions are appropriated for one class of rivers and so many for another class of rivers is very indefinite.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are all itemized.

Mr. NORRIS. I know, but we have not heard the items. What good does it do to have the statement printed in the RECORD after we have voted on it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall be glad to read the items if the Senator desires.

Mr. NORRIS. We get the information after we have decided the question. It is like getting your verdict first and trying your lawsuit afterwards.

I was exceedingly interested in personal observation of some of these rivers. I remember some time ago when, as a member of the committee representing the Senate, I went down to examine the Muscle Shoals project, and in order to go up to the property owned by the Government near a coal mine in the mountains we had to go by river. We went on a Government boat that plies up and down that river all the way to New Orleans, I think. On that trip I went over the business with the captain of the vessel, and I was exceedingly interested in the business he was doing and the handicaps to which he was subjected. I can not give the figures now, but I remember the proportion of the figures. He went to New Orleans and loaded his boat with various kinds of produce and brought them up the river to within, I think, about 50 miles of Birmingham, Ala., on the Warrior River. They shipped a good deal of stuff to Birmingham, and among other things was the item of coffee, I remember. He told me the freight rate by rail on coffee before the Government boat was built during the war. The Government was operating it there because it had no other use for it. It was not the only boat. There were several of them. He gave me the original freight rate on coffee by rail from New Orleans to Birmingham, Ala. Then they put on this vessel. They hauled coffee from New Orleans destined to Birmingham, and they hauled it on the boat to within, I think, 50 or 60 miles of Birmingham, where it had to be unloaded and put on a train.

Mr. McKELLAR. About 20 miles.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that all?

Mr. McKELLAR. And the coffee came from Mobile instead of from Birmingham, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. This, I think, came from New Orleans.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I remember that pretty distinctly. Now, as soon as that boat was put on the railroads cut down the freight rate on coffee from New Orleans to Birmingham very materially, but when this Government boat carried coffee from New Orleans up to a point almost within sight of Birmingham it had to utilize the railroad to get the coffee into Birmingham. That freight rate had to be divided. I have forgotten now the price and the proportion of the division, but for this little haul the railroad got very much more than half of the cost of transportation.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I shall be very glad to have the Senator say what he remembers about that matter.

Mr. RANDELL. My recollection is that the railroad got 80 per cent of it and the river got about 20 per cent of it.

Mr. NORRIS. The proportion was 80 and 20, was it?

Mr. RANDELL. I think it was.

Mr. NORRIS. It was something like that.

I use Birmingham as an illustration, and I use coffee as an illustration. Of course, you must understand that they are only illustrations. They only demonstrate what is done with all other kinds of freight that the boats carry. Notwithstanding that division, which gave the water transportation almost nothing and the railroad pretty nearly all of it, they were about breaking even on expenses, and in the expenses they counted the overhead of the cost of that vessel, which was built during the war at a price double what it could be duplicated for now. If I am wrong about any of these things, I shall be glad to be corrected by the Senator from Louisiana, who heard at least a part of this conversation with the captain. I had several. I think, however, I remember distinctly his telling me—and he gave the cost, how much he could have that boat built for in a first-class establishment and how much it actually cost during the war—that if they would capitalize that vessel at what it was worth, and what it would cost to build another one just like it, he would have been making money for the Government on the transaction, notwithstanding the awful handicap that he was up against.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows that that river service is under the same direction and control that the Mississippi River is under—the Mississippi-Warrior Barge Line?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The statement that the Senator has made about the Warrior River applies to the Mississippi River, and with a great deal more force, for the reason that the Mississippi River Barge Line has been uniformly not only breaking even but making money, and sufficient money to overcome any loss that has been made on the Warrior Barge Line. They had an accident last fall, but they are now making money, and they are transporting freights, especially heavy freights, at very much lower prices than the railroad. Of course, wherever there is a division between the railroad and the river lines, the railroad gets the large share of the freight; but enormous quantities of freight are being shipped up the Mississippi River and the Warrior River, just as the Senator has said, and I am glad to hear him refer to it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am giving this as an illustration, on the theory that it applies to all similar conditions of shipping.

Mr. President, there were two objections even to continuing this service. First, it was Government operation, and there are some people—very nice people—who are so opposed to Government operation that they would not have anything to do with Government operation even if it saved their souls from immortal terror. This boat was operated by the Government, and some were in favor of discontinuing it because it is operated by the Government, and others are in favor of continuing the handicap because they would be glad to see Government operation of anything fail. I know a Senator who is so much opposed to Government operation that he will not eat down in the Senate restaurant.

Mr. RANDELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. RANDELL. The Senator's argument appeals to me, and I wish to corroborate, in substance, what the Senator has said. I think he has stated the case fairly. I am not certain as to the exact percentages, but my recollection is that, although the boat going from Mobile to Birminghamport, which is a little port of the city of Birmingham, would travel 380 miles and the railroad would have to carry the freight about 20 miles, that the boat would receive 20 per cent of the freight paid and the railroad would receive 80 per cent of the freight paid. Of course the distance the freight was carried by the railroad was ridiculously short as compared with the distance it was carried by the boat.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Tennessee was wrong and that the Senator from Louisiana is wrong in dividing the distance. Let me ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] how far Birmingham is from the Warrior River.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The center of the city of Birmingham is about 18 miles from it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator is right.

Mr. RANDELL. I said about 20.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course Birmingham runs out in that direction about 6 miles to Ensley, so that there is a part of the city which is within 12 miles of the river.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is right in the other figure he gave, 380 miles.

Mr. RANDELL. The railroads are making a very unfair division of rates with the boats; and, if I am correctly informed, the authorities in charge of that line have for three years had the question of a fair division of rates on that line up with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and have not been able to get it adjusted yet. Why the Interstate Commerce Commission are keeping it before them so long I do not know, but they have it before them.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the same captain whom I asked why they submitted to such a division told me that some legislation on the part of Congress was needed. That is what I rose to speak about, and what I have said is only preliminary. It is an exceedingly interesting question. I would not be opposed to making Federal appropriations for the improvement of rivers if they were utilized according to the theory advanced whenever we are making the appropriations; but to permit our own Government, which is plying its boats up and down these rivers, to be "skinned to death" by the railroads when they come to divide the freight return is almost abhorrent. If we are going to do that, we ought to cease appropriating money.

Mr. RANDELL. I understand the Interstate Commerce Commission has authority to adjust those rates and make a fair division between the water carrier and the rail carrier. Of course, the Interstate Commerce Commission is a court, and those are very intricate and difficult questions. It has been working on those questions and has taken a great deal of testimony, I understand, and I assume it is going to render a fair decision. I understand it has the power, and if it does not have it, then I am absolutely with the Senator from Nebraska in his suggestion that we ought to legislate. I do not believe that we need any more legislation; I believe that we need proper administration of the law we have. If we can get that, we will get a fair division of rates between the rail and water carriers.

Mr. NORRIS. We have been going on this way for years. In this case it happens that we are dealing with the Government, but I would say the same thing if it were a private corporation operating the boats, namely, that it does not take a student to tell that the division the Senator has mentioned and which I have mentioned is unfair. There is no necessity of getting an expert to tell that at least that is not right; but that is going on now, and has been for several years, at least. It seems to me that when we are appropriating money for the improvement of harbors and rivers, it is a good time, while we are doing it, to protect the very navigation we are providing for, which we are not doing now.

Mr. RANDELL. That is true. I want to be just to the commission and to the barge line as well. I believe, along that same line, there is an adjustment of rates on the Mississippi. I think they have the lines joined, although I am not positive as to that. There has been a great controversy as to the Mississippi and the Warrior, and Senators can see that it is a most difficult question.

Mr. NORRIS. There is some technicality which I think a witness before the committee called to my attention.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me just a moment—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Permit me to state the real question involved here. I am not here trying to run down the railroad interests, but it is just as natural for a railroad management to try to put water transportation out of business as it is for a dog to chase a cat.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They have been doing it for 40 or 50 years. The difficulty is that these transportation lines, especially on the Warrior, in the first place would not make a joint rate through from New York or New Orleans, and when they were forced to do that, then they would not make the terminal joint rates, giving through bills of lading, and so forth, and when they were forced to do that the railroad took all the joint rate, or practically all of it.

The division is not 20 and 80 per cent. I think, on the average, where the joint rate through from New Orleans would be 5 cents the water route gets less than half a cent. An old railroad man who knows the business and knows of the transaction told me yesterday that these barges go from the Birmingham district loaded with coal to New Orleans. Of course, to make it pay they must have a return cargo. They come back partly loaded with coffee from New Orleans for Birmingham. That is unloaded at Tuscaloosa instead of at Birmingham port, Tuscaloosa being about 60 miles away. The return rate on the coffee was 43 cents, he told me. There was a transfer charge at Mobile which took out about 5 cents, leaving a net rate of 38 cents, and the railroad took the entire 38 cents, leaving nothing to the Government barge line.

I did not intend to bring that up now, but the Interstate Commerce Commission, a Government commission, has the absolute authority to fix this rate, and this is a Government proposition. The Secretary of War, so to speak, is the president of this barge line, because it is under his direction. Yet they allow a Government organization, to wit, the Interstate Commerce Commission, to sit here and permit a private corporation, a railroad, to take away the entire freight and make no division with the Government operation at all. No legislation is needed. It is entirely within the Government's hands to correct this matter if it will. I do agree with the Senator, however, that if our own Government will not protect its own operation, then there ought to be an investigation of somebody or there should be legislation to make them do what is right.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has said in reality what I was trying to say, and said it much better. If the Government will not see that a fair division of the charges for traffic is made between water transportation and rail transportation, there is no use in our improving rivers and harbors, especially our rivers. This is something which has been going on for years; and if it were allowed to continue indefinitely, like Jarndyce versus Jarndyce, any corporation, except a Government corporation, would be put out of business, because it would become bankrupt before justice could be rendered.

I can not understand, to begin with, how they could start in with that kind of a division of the rate. Who made the division to begin with, and why is it that all of it is going to the railroad and none of it to the boat, which carries the freight about five-sixths of the distance and does most of the work in connection with it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Such a discrimination has been practiced by the railroads against the Warrior Barge Line service that the line has not made money. I think it is due almost entirely to the fact of these discriminatory rates which have been put into effect by the railroads joining the river with Birmingham. It can not make money under the present division. For that reason they are even talking now about discontinuing that line.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that is the next thing. That is what they want.

Mr. McKELLAR. I feel interested in it for the reason that on the Mississippi River, on which I live, that sort of a condition does not apply, in the first instance, because there is a volume of trade which goes on between the cities right on the bank of the river; and, of course, the railroads, on the direct business, have no right to any part of the rate. But, at the same time, it affects the Mississippi Barge Line, because heavy freights, like molasses and sugar and coffee, come up from New Orleans to cities as far away as Nashville, which is about 264 miles from Memphis, and cities that far away take advantage of the barge line and have these heavy freights come up on the barge line as far as Memphis and then pay the regular rate from Memphis to Nashville in addition to the river rate and get their goods cheaper.

The Senator has put his finger right on the sore place, so far as the barge lines are concerned. A fair division of rates between the barge lines and the railroads would make those two barge lines of wonderful value to the people along their routes, and I think there should be an investigation, and, if necessary, there should be legislation by Congress, directing how these divisions of rates should be made as between the barge lines and the railroads.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator says this barge line on the Warrior does not pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am so informed, and the reason is that there is discrimination.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not disputing the statement. There is a reason in addition to the one the Senator has stated, which I gave a while ago. I do not know whether the Senator was in the Chamber at the time or not. I have been told that notwithstanding the discrimination, notwithstanding the small part of the rates given to the boats, whenever they have to divide it with the railroad, they still would make money if the boats which are doing the work were capitalized at their fair value.

Those boats were all built during the war for war purposes. They are fine vessels, and they are well equipped for the business in which they are engaged. They were built for that, but they were built at war prices. They cost, in round figures, twice what they are worth now. I think 50 cents on the dollar would be a fair value for them, and I am not saying anything against the boats when I say that. They are modern in every respect; but the cost of them during the war was twice what it would be now. They are compelled, in making their returns, in discovering whether they make a profit or a loss, to carry those vessels at their actual cost to the Government during the war. Of course, all the freight they carry is not subjected to this discrimination, and that is one reason why there is a difference between the illustration of the haul from New Orleans to Birmingham, part water and part rail, and traffic on the big Mississippi River. Wherever freight is delivered to a city located on the bank of that river there is no division; the boat gets it all. Of course, they make more money, and they do not have to give the bulk of it to a railroad. On the Mississippi they do not have to divide with a railroad at all between New Orleans and the great city of Memphis, or any other river port.

Mr. McKELLAR. St. Louis, for instance.

Mr. NORRIS. This discrimination applies only where it is part rail and part water, and, as a matter of fact, a large percentage of the traffic is of that kind, as illustrated by the city of Birmingham, one of the largest cities in the South, where there is an immense amount of freight coming and going. They can not get to Birmingham without utilizing the railroad.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion? While it is true that the Warrior River line did not make money, according to the figures to which the Senator refers, at the same time the Mississippi River line, under the same management and control, made enough profits to make both ventures profitable.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the Senator would admit that if it is to be a continuing loss, the fact that one line makes money and the other line does not is not sufficient reason for keeping up the losing line. I think it is due to the division of rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. In this connection I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that shows what kind of rates the people along the Warrior River would have to pay if it were not for the barge line. As the Senator from Nebraska well said, the railroads put in another rate on coffee so as to compete with our line, and that was a benefit to the people of that section.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to that situation, I do not think any investigation is necessary. I do not think any legislation is necessary for the Warrior River situation. The committee considered it very fully a year ago. A case was then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is my understanding that the case has been fully argued—

Mr. McKELLAR. It is still pending.

Mr. LENROOT. The decision is being awaited and has been awaited for six months or more. It would seem to me that if the Senators who are especially interested in the matter would ask the commission to expedite it they might get a very much earlier decision.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can assure the Senator I shall do that right away.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can assure the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senators who are interested in the division of freight rates have been very diligent in their efforts to get an early decision. What is the reason for the delay I can not say. I can not attempt to criticize the commission, because I do not know the reason for the delay, but I do know with the Government operation on the one hand and the railroads on the other absolutely taking practically all of the freight rate, if the Government can function at all it is time to be doing something.

Mr. LENROOT. I entirely agree with the Senator. Certainly the matter ought not to run another year before decision. We ought to have the decision at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator leaves that point, if after the decision comes for any reason they claim they have not the necessary power to make a proper division, I assume the Senator, of course, would be willing to vote to grant to the commission power to make a proper division?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, of course.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think they have full power.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not any doubt of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the division under existing law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Nor have I any doubt about the power of the commission, but I can not understand why it takes so long to decide a particular case.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the pending amendment, if we may return to it, I think it is subject to a point of order, because I can not find that the appropriation proposed is authorized by any existing law. However, I am not going to make the point of order. It has been fully debated, and I am willing that it should be voted upon.

But I do want to emphasize the precedent that the Senate would establish if the amendment were adopted. We would have, in the first place, an appropriation for which there is no authorization in existing law. Under the lump-sum appropriation the Board of Engineers would not have the right to expend the sum upon the improvement which the amendment seeks to require them to expend. In the second place, as a matter of commerce and navigation—and that is the only thing that has any bearing so far as the bill is concerned—the appropriation can not be defended for one single moment.

I asked what the commerce was upon this part of the river from Sioux City to Fort Benton. I find that in 1903 the commerce was 37,000 tons; in 1904, 28,000; in 1905, 52,000; in 1906, 43,000; in 1907, 45,000; and in 1921, 9,164 tons. In 1912 Congress adopted a project for the improvement of the river which contemplated the expenditure of from $75,000 to $150,000 each year for a period of five years. Under that authorization, which has been completely exhausted, there has been expended $582,972.

Mr. STERLING. That is the project from Sioux City to Fort Benton.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. Of course, I did not mean the particular spot which has been under discussion. There has been expended $582,972, which has not increased commerce one single pound but has resulted, not because of the improvement but because of other causes, in a constantly decreasing commerce. What was it that the board of engineers say with reference to the improvement, to which the Senator from South Dakota takes exception? They said in their annual report:

The expenditures on this section have averaged about $90,000 per annum for the past few years, and there has been no commercial development as a result of this expenditure, but, on the contrary, the commerce has declined very materially, so that the benefits to the general public are incommensurate with the outlay involved, and there seems to be little prospect of better returns in the near future.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator state what they said with reference to the commerce between Kansas City and the mouth of the Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. It would take me a moment to find it.

Mr. McCUMBER. And how much they have had there? I would like to have the Senator also state what it consists of.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, while the Senator from Wisconsin is looking up the figures will he yield to me to present a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ladd in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Replying to the question of the Senator from North Dakota, the commerce was 139,444 tons.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of what did it consist? I know what it was, but I would like to have the Senator state.

Mr. LENROOT. I will state from my general recollection that it was sand and gravel that comprised the larger part of the tonnage.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was practically all sand that was used for building purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is true. But the point I am making, with reference to the stretch of river covered by the Senator's amendment, is that we have expended there over half a million dollars. The commerce has been constantly declining upon the stream until this year it was 9,164 tons as against between 30,000 and 40,000 tons 20 years ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator if he would not find exactly the same situation with reference to the Mississippi River?

Mr. LENROOT. I think on the upper Mississippi that is true.

Mr. KING. Is not that true of the lower Mississippi?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know as to the tonnage.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the statement the Senator made?

Mr. LENROOT. I said there had been a decline in tonnage on the upper Missouri from between 30,000 and 40,000 tons to 9,000 tons, and I was asked whether the same proportion was not true of the Mississippi. I said I did not think that it would apply to the lower Mississippi.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would not apply to that part of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and New Orleans. On the contrary, the increase there has been phenomenal.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But it is indisputable that from St. Paul down the decline has been at least proportionate.

Mr. LENROOT. The commerce from St. Paul down to St. Louis has practically ceased. I want to say to the Senator that I am just as much opposed to making large appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River under present conditions as I am to making appropriations for the improvement of any other stream.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to ask the Senator whether, in his consideration of the subject, he has not ascertained it to be a fact that whenever a river is improved so as to make it navigable the railroads paralleling it allow what are commonly known along the river as water rates, in order to reduce their freight rates below the point where it would pay to operate a water-transportation line, and that therefore the money expended in the improvement of the rivers is reflected in the benefits which the people thus get who pay the freights, and they thus receive a benefit as a direct result of the improvement of the river?

Mr. LENROOT. I have very fully investigated that matter. I am quite familiar with the situation. It is true, or has been true, generally speaking, that where we have water competition the railroad rates were made so low, as long as competition lasted, as to drive water transportation out of business. But, Mr. President, to make enormous appropriations out of the Treasury of the United States for that purpose alone can not be defended for one single moment. That is to say, if the railroads can make a rate that is a fair rate of return so low that it is more profitable to ship by rail than by water, then we can not justify water transportation.

The trouble is and has been that railroads have made rates so low that in themselves they are lower than they ought to be to pay their fair share of operating expenses of the roads and a fair return on the investment. But there, again, whenever a railroad makes such a rate too low to pay its share of operating expenses, while it is a benefit to the people who are using that railroad, it is an injury to every other user of the railroads, because their rates then must be just that much higher than they ought to be, in order to make up the loss in this particular direction.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator said the traffic on the upper Mississippi River was disappearing. Did the Government barges which were at one time constructed to operate above St. Louis go into operation?

Mr. LENROOT. They did not. They were taken to the lower part of the Mississippi River.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand those barges are still in the hands of the companies that contracted to build them, and that the contract has never been canceled. Of course, up to this time, although the barges have not been used, the company has complied with the terms of the contract; so they are tied up, doing nothing at present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator spoke of the upper Mississippi River and its declining commerce. The proposal of the engineers under the $56,000,000 river and harbor appropriation is that $1,100,000 be spent for new work on the upper Mississippi. It is not a very cheerful prospect.

Mr. KING. How much for maintenance?

Mr. WADSWORTH. None for maintenance.

Mr. LENROOT. On the upper Mississippi it is all under the head of new work, because it is new work that maintains the river. I do not think there is any such thing as dredging upon the upper Mississippi.

Mr. KING. However, if I understand the Senator, there is $500,000 for maintenance upon the Missouri River within the State of Missouri, and a considerable amount over a million, perhaps a million and a half, for improvements?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not remember the exact figures.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amounts are $1,000,000 for improvement and $500,000 for maintenance.

Mr. KING. Then, the $1,500,000 could be spent on the river in Missouri, where concededly the commerce has been declining for the past 50 or 60 years, until for many years there has practically been no commerce upon the river between the points referred to; that is, Kansas City and St. Louis.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will suffer a further interruption, the question really is as to where the $1,500,000, the $15,000, and the $25,000 which are going to be spent on the Missouri River shall be expended; whether the $1,500,000 shall be spent between Kansas City and the mouth of the river, where the commerce is equally declining, and but $25,000 and $15,000 shall be spent above Kansas City. That is the question that the Senate is called upon to determine.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be, but it is fair to say, with reference to that question, that the expenditure of $1,000,000 on the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth can not, it seems to me, be thought of for a moment by anybody except upon the theory that here is an existing project for a completed improvement of the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth which is to give, I believe, an 8 or 9 foot channel.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that is what the engineers propose to do.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; there is an adopted project. The Senator must see that there is a big distinction between a stretch of a river, its lower part, with an adopted project for an adopted improvement at a fixed expenditure of money that will make that river susceptible of navigation, and a proposition as to which there is no existing project, as to which there is no estimate of any kind, as to how much money would be required to make the river navigable. That is just the difference between the Kansas City proposition and the upper Missouri proposition.

I am frank to say that I do not believe we ought to expend that $1,000,000 upon the lower Missouri. I have said a great many times upon this floor that I think we ought to complete the improvement of and put in the most perfect shape possible the Mississippi River from St. Louis to its mouth; and that we ought to complete the Ohio River, so that we shall have a system of navigation extending the full length of the Ohio and from St. Louis to the mouth of the Mississippi. Then I maintain that if that should not be a commercial success it would be a pure waste to expend further money on the Missouri River, on the Mississippi River, or on any other rivers similarly situated.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator accept an amendment or vote for an amendment to this effect:

Provided, That no part of this sum—

Referring to the $56,000,000 plus—shall be expended upon the Missouri River between the city of St. Louis and the city of Kansas City?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I would hardly wish to go that far.

Mr. KING. I shall offer such an amendment, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will vote for it.

Mr. LENROOT. I would, however, vote for an amendment providing that no part of the money should be expended for improvements other than maintenance on that part of the river. I should not wish to go so far as to say that we ought to let the river get in worse shape each year than it now is so long as we have the existing projects.

Mr. President, it was stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that last year there were only 9,000 tons of commerce upon this part of the river, embracing a distribute of something like 1,000 miles. It was stated, however, that we had hard times last year, and commerce decreased for that reason.

Mr. McCUMBER. And there have been hard times for several years past.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, I will go back to a period when we did not have very hard times and see what the commerce then was. The year 1916 was not a period of hard times, as I recollect.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will suffer an interruption, I will remark that the tonnage reflects exactly the productiveness of the fields in those sections. The year 1916 was a productive year and the tonnage was 22,151. Then came the seasons of drought in 1917, when the tonnage was 6,285; in 1918, when it was 3,986; in 1919, when it was 1,572; in 1920, when it was 3,261. Conditions improved last year and the traffic was 9,164 tons. As the country develops and as we have fair seasons the traffic increases.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator dispute the figures that I have read as to the commerce of 20 years ago, when 25,000, 30,000, 35,000, and nearly 40,000 tons a year were transported?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am sure the Senator will find that the traffic 40 years ago was even more than it was 10 years ago.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be, but, of course, the reason the traffic was so heavy a half century ago was because there was no railroad communication at all and the river was the only way by which goods could be transported through those sections of country. However, for the past 20 years there has been no change so far as railroad accommodations are concerned, and one would naturally expect that the country has grown in 20 years. There are greater areas in production now than there were 20 years ago, and yet the commerce on the river has declined instead of increased.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin contend that because there is now railroad communication and products are shipped by railroad therefore we should let the river remain filled up and unnavigable? Will it not be of interest and benefit to producers that they have a navigable river there by which they can transport their commodities if railroad freights become exorbitantly high?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, again I wish to get back to the railroad question. The idea that we are going to regulate railroad rates by large appropriations out of the Treasury for waterway improvements is a fallacy, and it seems to me that we ought to have passed the stage where we would make any such argument. If there were no way to regulate railroads, if we had no power of regulation, that argument might well be made, but when we have a Government agency whose duty it is to see to it that railroad rates shall not be exorbitant and that they shall be reasonable, I do not know how anyone can argue that for the purpose of bringing railroad rates down—and for that purpose alone—we should expend these tremendous sums out of the Treasury of the United States.

There is just one situation, Mr. President, where we are justified in expending large sums out of the Treasury, and it exists in every part of our country, and that is where water transportation can be carried on not only cheaper than railroad transportation, with just and fair rates, but where the cost of the improvement will be commensurate with the saving made in the rates. There are to-day, in the case of some rivers in this country, improvements upon which we are paying each year for maintenance not only three or four times the railroad rates, but there have been cases where we could have better afforded to have bought and paid for the entire value of the commerce upon the river. So, Mr. President, on the Mississippi and on the Ohio, I hope that when navigation is fully developed the saving, not as compared with railroad rates, but the saving between a just and a fair railroad rate and the water rate will be so great that it will justify the cost out of the Treasury of the United States. If an improvement can not be justified upon that ground, it ought not to be made at all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says that he hopes that will be the result when navigation is developed on the lower Mississippi and the Ohio Rivers. We all share that hope; but, in view of past experience, does he expect it to be realized?

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to say frankly that, while I have been very skeptical concerning any of our river improvements, I am more hopeful than I have been for years that the lower Mississippi may justify the expenditures which have been made under existing projects, and when the improvement of the Ohio is completed it is possible, I think, that it may justify the expenditure, but I do not believe the Government of the United States should be conducting at the same time a half dozen experiments which can be nothing but experiments. If we conduct one, and that is a success, then it is time enough to move on to some other, but, if that one fails, who is there who can defend the waste of money upon four or five others, all doomed to failure?

Mr. President, with reference to this matter, can the Senator from North Dakota or the Senators from South Dakota give any estimate to the Senate of how much it would cost to improve the 1,000 miles of river to make it navigable, assuming there would be commerce developed upon it if it were navigable? They can not; no estimate has ever been made by anyone. To make a few hundred feet or a few miles of revetment here and there, so far as commerce is concerned upon the river, means absolutely nothing.

There is another feature of this question, of course, and that is the reclamation of lands belonging to abutting owners and the benefit to abutting owners; but, Mr. President, I submit that while an argument may be made that the Government owes a duty to participate in such work, the Government owes no duty to any man who has abutting upon a river land that has been valueless from the dawn of creation, because flooded during certain seasons of the year, out of the Treasury of the United States to make it the most valuable farming land in the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I suppose the Senator understands that we do not base our contentions for this improvement or for this appropriation upon the ground that the Government owes such a duty.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator spoke of that contention.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know but that we may yet come to it. We shall see, I hope, that from the standpoint of national interest and national welfare it would be the thing for this Government to do to protect the banks from waste and erosion and the washing of the best farms of the country into the Missouri River, and that from that standpoint alone we ought to improve the river and put in this necessary revetment work. However, we base our claim on the ground that it will benefit commerce and navigation. Of course by the revetment work and the dikes which may be built the banks will be protected, but it is alike in the interest of commerce and navigation that the improvement would be made.

Mr. LENROOT. What interest of commerce and navigation will be subserved if we spend a few hundred thousand dollars, if you please, when in order to get a navigable river it would require many, many millions?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I thought I stated that a while ago. According to the estimate of the engineers 400,000,000 tons of silt are washed from the Missouri River into the Mississippi River annually, and there we expend the millions year after year for the purpose of improving the Mississippi River in dredging it and keeping it navigable.

Mr. LENROOT. How much money does the Senator think it would take to put revetments in the 1,000 miles of the Missouri River to prevent that silt from coming down? How much does the Senator think it would cost?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, well, now, that is a rather strange question to ask. Every bit of revetment work will help so much. It will at the same time protect the lands where the revetment work is placed, but it will help just so much in the interest of commerce.

Mr. LENROOT. That exactly gets down to the point. The revetment work will help the lands; that is true; but unless we have a project that means that we will go into this proposed revetment work, perhaps costing hundreds of millions of dollars, for all I know, and will not aid commerce and navigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. In 1915 I had a very eminent engineer make an estimate for me as to what the improvement of the Mississippi River would cost if the absolutely necessary revetment work were done.

Mr. STERLING. The Mississippi River?

Mr. SMOOT. The Mississippi River. The figures showed that you could build a four-track railroad following the Mississippi from the head to the mouth, equip it, and haul the freight for nothing for the interest upon the amount it would cost; so I made up my mind that that was not a very good investment, and I believe that if it is ever undertaken that will be the result. The trouble with this whole appropriation for rivers and harbors is that we dole out a few hundred thousand dollars here and a few hundred thousand dollars there, and before the 12 months have gone it is all expended, and within a year the river is in just the same condition as it was before the money was spent.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to the Senator that we have already expended, during all the years of the past, $3,447,000 upon the upper Missouri River, with a constantly decreasing commerce, until it has almost disappeared.

Mr. SMOOT. We have in this bill a lot of projects that are just exactly of the same kind. For instance, take the Jamaica Bay project. In 1910 the traffic on that project was 1,785,605 tons. In 1916 it fell to 736,775 tons. In 1917 it had lost 85 per cent of the amount that there was in 1910—only 15 per cent of the amount—and here this project is to cost $11,806,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator must remember that that is New York, not in North Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not talking about New York or North Dakota or any other State. I am talking about the whole project. When we find rivers here with money appropriated for them where it costs $150 a ton for all the merchandise carried over them, outside of the logs that can float down the stream, without any improvement whatever, it seems to me it would be much cheaper, as I said in 1916, for the Government of the United States to buy all the merchandise every year and give it to the people rather than to try to maintain here the appropriations for what are supposed to be rivers but are nothing more nor less than creeks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Utah know about as much about the machinery of legislation as any other two Senators, and I should like to ask either one or both of them how this thing has been arranged so as to put this appropriation for rivers and harbors into an Army bill. Of course, it was not intended so, but if anybody had intended to accentuate the extravagance and the waste with reference to the matter, that would have been the way to accomplish it. How did it come about, and how can we unscramble it?

Mr. LENROOT. We have no power over it, because the Senate has nothing to do with the matter of placing river and harbor items in the Army bill. The House originates general appropriation bills. The House adopted this plan and sent it to us, and we did nothing but consider the bill in the form sent to us by the House.

Mr. BORAH. Could not the Senate committee separate the two bills and bring in an Army bill and bring in a river and harbor bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We could not get them both into conference at the same time with the same people. That is the trouble. We thrashed that over last year, wondering if we could not do that very thing, and it is almost impossible.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the only excuse for it at all is because of the fact that the projects are under an Army officer. That is the only excuse for it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I understand that that is the reason though it is no excuse at all; but, Mr. President, it is a serious matter, because if this matter can not be arranged differently, if the river and harbor bill can not come in here upon its own merits and stand upon its merits and be debated and discussed as an individual and separate measure, there is no possibility of stopping this waste and extravagance. I suspect that in all probability, if this bill stood alone, the President of the United States would either stop it or change it, from what has been said; but he is powerless, the Senate is powerless, the taxpayers are undefended and unprotected, and the whole situation has been so arranged that there is absolutely no way in the world to prevent this waste.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only success that we have ever had in cutting down river and harbor appropriations in the Senate of the United States since I have been a Member of this body was in the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, when a determined fight was made upon the floor of the Senate, and the amount appropriated by the House was cut in 1915 to $20,000,000, in 1916 to $25,000,000, and in 1917 to $30,000,000, as I remember. I am speaking now just offhand.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SMOOT. That was the first time we have ever been able in this body to secure enough votes to change a river and harbor bill.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt my colleague or the Senator from Wisconsin, but, apropos of the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho, it seems to me, notwithstanding the action of the House, that we would have the power, unless we have made some rule that forecloses us, to move to segregate this part of the bill and to assign to the Commerce Committee, or such committee as we deem proper, the items dealing with rivers and harbors and let the residue of the bill go to the Committee on Military Affairs. Of course, I can understand what the situation would be. We would pass the items dealing with military affairs and send the bill to the House; the House might refuse to accede, appoint conferees, and there might be a protracted disagreement.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me correct the Senator. No part of this bill would go to either the Military Affairs Committee or the Commerce Committee in any event. All bills go to the Appropriations Committee here, and all bills go to the Appropriations Committee in the House. What the Senator from New York refers to, however, is that there are different conferees from the different subcommittees of the Appropriation Committees, so that there would be one set of conferees from the Committee on Appropriations on military affairs and another set upon rivers and harbors affairs.

Mr. KING. I understood that. I used those two sets of conferees, one as representative of the Military Affairs Committee and one as representative of the Committee on Commerce; but I affirm now that that could be done. We could strike from this bill, if we wished, all items respecting rivers and harbors, and recommit them to the Appropriations Committee, to that branch of it that has to do with rivers and harbors, and they could report back such a bill as in their wisdom and judgment they deemed necessary.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator can very readily see that that can not be done, because all we could do would be to strike the river and harbor item from the bill. Then it would go to conference, the conferees taking the position that there would be no agreement unless the river and harbor item is included.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean that the Appropriations Committee would have no authority to report a river and harbor bill?

Mr. LENROOT. We have no power to take it out of the bill. It is there. We may adopt an amendment disagreeing to it, but it simply goes to conference.

Mr. KING. The policy that I suggested, of course, would reach the same result—that we move to strike out those items—and it seems to me that there would be no rule—

Mr. LENROOT. But they will not be stricken out by the adoption of that motion. That is the trouble.

Mr. KING. If we should adopt it, they would be stricken out as far as the Senate is concerned.

Mr. LENROOT. They would be stricken out so far as the Senate is concerned; but the matter goes to conference, and if the House conferees take the position that they insist upon the items staying in or there will be no Army bill we have a special session ahead of us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suppose the test would come on the question as to whether the House would rather have a river and harbor bill or no Army bill. I think, perhaps, as keen as the appetite is to reach the Treasury, there would be some embarrassment in refusing to agree to a bill making appropriations for the Army. There is no way in the world that I can see to meet this situation except that way. This may not be the time to do it, on account of the fact that we are all so anxious to get away after the 4th of March; but I doubt very much if the House would be any less anxious to get away than we are. I think it needs a Caesarian operation of some kind, and the only way to do it, in my opinion, is to meet it, and meet it now. I am not one of those who are opposed to river and harbor appropriations in their entirety.

Mr. SMOOT. Neither am I.

Mr. BORAH. I do not say that appropriations should not be made for this purpose. I have very much less faith in any of them than many of my associates. Nevertheless, it seems reasonable that there should be appropriations for some of these larger and more feasible propositions; but, Mr. President, intermingled with the appropriations which ought to be made are thousands of dollars—yes, millions of dollars—of appropriations which ought not to be made. The time had come in the discussion of river and harbor appropriations when those things to some degree were being managed, controlled, and eliminated; but this method of dealing with the subject has entirely prevented and will entirely prevent any such success in the future, and if we are not ready simply to surrender the proposition and permit this thing to go on its way and gather force as it goes, we shall have to meet it now.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, during the past two or three years I have favored lump-sum appropriations to be allotted by the Board of Engineers; but, in view of what has happened upon this bill, I am very frank to say that I am not in favor of continuing lump-sum appropriations for that purpose, because, without criticizing anybody, I think, perhaps, I am in the same position as anybody else. If a Senator or a Member of the House has an improvement of the highest merit with a lump-sum appropriation, he is not very much inclined to cut down the lump sum, because he does not know but that his own meritorious appropriation will be cut out and some appropriation less meritorious will be put in. So far as improvement is concerned—maintenance is a different proposition—so far as improvement is concerned, I think hereafter the bills ought to be itemized and specific appropriations made for each project, and then the Senate and the House can act intelligently upon the merits of the different projects and fight in conference for the elimination of such projects as they think are not wise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am rather disappointed in the results of what we believed to be a reform which was inaugurated.

I was one who contended for lump-sum appropriations, and I offered an amendment in 1917, and renewed it in 1918 and 1919, calling for the creation of a board, as I recall now, of two Army engineers and three civilians of business ability and knowledge of this question of rivers and harbors. I was not satisfied to leave the river and harbor appropriations in the hands of Army engineers. I make no comment upon their ability or their extravagance or lack of extravagance, or their competency to deal with these questions; but I was absolutely unwilling, and I am unwilling now, to leave with the Army engineers exclusively the handling of these stupendous sums.

The criticism which is made by the Senator from North Dakota that they stay in Kansas City and do not appear to be able to perceive the importance of the Missouri River, except in the vicinity of Kansas City, is an indictment of some of the Army engineers or their methods of procedure, which I think is entirely justified.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KING. Let me just complete the sentence. A perusal of the hundreds of reports and of the thousands of pages which have been submitted by Army engineers demonstrates to my satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of others, their absolute incompetence to deal with the great questions which are involved in the improvement of our rivers and harbors. I am not attacking their technical skill, but I am attacking their business judgment; I am attacking their methods of administration; I am attacking the methods which have been employed. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to ask the Senator if the fact that the Army engineers stopped at Kansas City, or are alleged to have stopped there, is not due to the fact, in turn, that the Congress adopted a project of $20,000,000 worth of work to be done there? Where would they stop? Why go to the headwaters of the Missouri, in connection with which Congress has adopted no project for the expenditure of money? Congress goes ahead and adopts a $20,000,000 project, the money to be spent between Kansas City and the mouth of the river. Is it the Army engineer's fault that he does not spend half or more than half of his time up at Fort Benton?

Mr. KING. If I may trespass further on the time of the Senator from Wisconsin—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. The criticism of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota was a little broader, and rests upon a little broader foundation, as I interpreted his remarks, and as I interpret the position of the Senator from New York, from that upon which the Senator from New York is now predicated his inquiry. The position of the Senator from North Dakota was, in substance, that the Army engineers for years had directed their attention too much to that part of the river below Kansas City, and doubtless upon their recommendations large appropriations had been made for that part of the river, and they had not sufficiently perceived the relation of the river above Kansas City to the entire project, but had seemed to concentrate their attention and make their recommendations based upon the Missouri River within the State of Missouri.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not believe the engineers are properly subject to the criticism which has been made, and I had no thought, in saying I was not in favor of continuing the lump-sum appropriation, of reflecting in any way upon the engineers.

What is the situation? The Senator from New York has referred to the one project. Congress adopts projects, and that determines the policy of Congress, that each of these shall be improved in accordance with the estimates, and, once adopted by Congress, the engineers then make their estimates of the sum that can profitably be expended upon each one of the projects which have been adopted.

My criticism is not of the engineers, but my point is that if we had separate appropriations for each project to pass upon it would give Congress some opportunity to review the matter of its previous action with reference to the adoption of the project and to refuse to grant an appropriation where the engineers would be perfectly justified in estimating for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wanted to say to the Senator that the engineers are not always free from criticism. I have seen the time when a report of the engineers was made to this body, then an amendment offered in the Senate making a direct appropriation for the project, a Senator visiting the Engineer Department, and the engineers coming in the next day with a report favoring the very project on which they had reported adversely before.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that all gets back to the proposition that the Congress of the United States can not shun or shunt its responsibility in this matter. It is up to us. Of course, I take it that an engineer is not considering the question of taxes or the question of the amount in the Treasury. That is not his business. He has a certain thing to do, and that is to engineer the proposition that is presented to him. But the responsibility for adopting these projects, approving them, and for the appropriation, is right here, and it is here apparently in spite of the fact that we created a Budget Bureau some time ago. Unless the Congress itself takes hold of the matter and deals with it upon the theory that it alone is responsible for the entire appropriation, we shall not hope to correct the evil.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am in thorough accord with what has been said, and I hope that this will be the last year we will have lump-sum appropriations for such improvements. If we had each one of these items estimated for separately, anyone can see that the Senate would have an opportunity of striking some of them out, and standing in conference against them, and they would not stay in the bill, and it could increase other items if necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. A few moments ago, while the Senator was talking, a question was raised as to the volume of business on the Mississippi River from St. Louis down. I have gotten the barge line figures of business since it was created. It began business on November 1, 1919, and from that date to June 30, 1920, the end of the fiscal year, they carried 115,907 tons of freight. From July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, they carried 237,258 tons of freight. From July 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922, they carried 655,789 tons of freight. During the last fiscal year they nearly trebled the business of the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. LENROOT. That was my recollection, that the Mississippi River was beginning to make a very fair showing.

Mr. KING. May I be permitted to ask the Senator from Tennessee what that freight consisted of?

Mr. McKELLAR. Wheat, cotton, lumber, molasses, coal, tobacco, sugar, coffee, and merchandise generally.

Mr. KING. Between what points?

Mr. McKELLAR. Between St. Louis, Mo., and New Orleans, La.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether all that had its origin at St. Louis or points above?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not say where it had its origin. An immense amount of the up-river traffic had its origin at points in South America, Central America, and Cuba, for instance, heavy articles like sugar, black-strap molasses, and ordinary molasses, which, of course, the Senator knows is exceedingly heavy. A great deal of that business originated in Cuba.

Mr. KING. And was carried up the river?

Mr. McKELLAR. Carried up the river. Then, going back, the freights consisted largely of wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco. It is quite remarkable that from the tobacco regions of the State of the Senator from Kentucky, western Kentucky, and northwestern Tennessee, which is a very prolific tobacco producer, enormous amounts of tobacco are sent by rail to ports along the river, and thence transported to New Orleans and to the outside world.

Mr. KING. I made the inquiry because I have found oftentimes a duplication of tonnage.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this tonnage applies solely to the barge line. Of course, there is an enormous river traffic along that river outside of that.

Mr. KING. Are those privately owned barges?

Mr. McKELLAR. These are Government-owned barges, but there are other river craft which carry a very large amount of freight.

Mr. KING. While we are speaking of barges, the Senator will recall that during the war we made some appropriations, and Mr. Goltra and others in Missouri, as I understood, took a contract to construct these barges, and then they were operated under the direction of the Shipping Board or the railroad administration, I am not sure which. My understanding was that they were not being used now.

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection is that there was some direct appropriation made for it. I think it applied to traffic on the Missouri River north of St. Louis and did not apply from St. Louis south; but the Government-owned barge line, under the direction of the Secretary of War, is run between St. Louis and New Orleans.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not want to seem to be holding the floor—

Mr. McKELLAR. I am much obliged to the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from Utah asked the Senator from Tennessee a question to which perhaps he did not reply. I have heard the question asked several times with respect to the present operation of those barges. Some of those barges are now in operation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Which barges?

Mr. STANLEY. The Government-owned barges on the Mississippi.

Mr. McKELLAR. From St. Louis to New Orleans?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes. I was on the Mississippi River last December, just a few weeks ago, and saw those barges in operation. Of course, the Senator understands they are not the ordinary open barges. They are of steel construction, waterproof, and made in compartments. They carry silks, fine fabrics, and anything that can be carried.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if we may get back once more to the pending amendment, I said that, so far as the reclamation of lands was concerned, to make these appropriations out of the Treasury for the benefit of abutting landowners without any contribution upon their part could not be justified. It must be remembered that on the lower Mississippi now we require contributions on the part of the abutting landowners, and a few years ago an appropriation of $75,000 was made for revetments such as are proposed in the pending amendment, with a provision that there should be a contribution upon the part of the abutting owners of one-third of the expense or upon the municipality in the vicinity.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he would favor a policy of Government aid for the purpose of protecting the banks on the condition that the States contribute a part, and this irrespective of the benefit to commerce and navigation?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not say any such thing, but I do say that there was passed through Congress a few years ago an appropriation of $75,000, with a provision that there should be a contribution of one-third of the expense by local agencies, and when that condition was met, the improvement was not found so necessary as was supposed, and the $75,000 has never been expended, and has now been turned to surplus.

With reference to the Senator's question, I say this, of course I would not favor appropriations under a river and harbor bill where navigation was not the primary object, but I want to say, further, that where there is a combination of the two, there is no reason why the abutting owner should not pay for some of the benefits he receives from the improvements. But the trouble with the amendment is that there is no showing and can be no showing that the expenditure of the $250,000 would be of any material benefit to navigation.

I want to repeat what I said in the beginning, that we have expended in the last 10 years $582,000, with the result that the commerce has steadily declined until last year we had only 9,000 tons of commerce on a stretch of river over 1,000 miles in extent.

Mr. STERLING. I know something about the case to which the Senator refers. The people have wished a thousand times, I think, that they had not accepted the proposition made by the Government and involved in that appropriation, and raised the $25,000 to meet the Government appropriation of $75,000. Two hundred thousand dollars now would not make the improvement, because at the place where it was designed that the improvement should be made we have a lake rather than a river.

Mr. LENROOT. But that does not at all affect the point I made that where there were local interests whose interests were the primary interests, nevertheless when they had to make a contribution of 25 per cent of the total cost they did not want it badly enough to make the contribution. That is the point I make.

Mr. STERLING. They wanted it, but there were too many conservative citizens in that locality.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be. In conclusion, I want to say again that unless we are going to face amendments of this character, the same argument can be made with just as much ground for a million dollars at this point upon this same stretch of river, yes, for $10,000,000, as is made for the item of $250,000. If the Senate is now going to establish the precedent that it will make an appropriation not estimated for by the Board of Engineers, not adopted by Congress, not considered by the Committee on Commerce which has jurisdiction of the authorization, then we might as well repeal our Budget law entirely.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the discussion upon the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has gone far afield at one time or another since 11 o'clock this morning. I do not criticize the variety of the topics discussed, because I am going to indulge in a very brief discussion of something which does not concern the Senator's amendment.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has protested against the inclusion in the War Department appropriation bill of a river and harbor item. I desire to join him in that protest. Perhaps my reasons for doing so are not exactly the same as his, but they are nevertheless just as sincere. Briefly, let me sketch to the Senate what the increase in the river and harbor item does to the bill.

The estimates this year coming from the President of the United States through the Director of the Budget involved approximately $27,000,000 for rivers and harbors. Apparently—and I say this in all kindness—the House Committee on Appropriations, believing that there was a demand in the House of Representatives for a larger amount than the Budget estimate, reported the bill to the House carrying $37,000,000, an increase of $10,000,000 over the Budget estimate. On the floor of the House the $37,000,000 was raised to $57,000,000 by a vote of something like 3 or 4 to 1, the Appropriations Committee of the House and the House leaders being swept off their feet and very little discussion having occurred.

The net increase for rivers and harbors alone over the figures of the Budget is almost $29,000,000. A Senator interested in the proper balancing of the Government's expenditures in the course of a fiscal year, and, indeed, a Senator interested in a proper balancing of this great appropriation bill, can readily see what effect an increase of $29,000,000 over the Budget figure in one single item has upon the whole bill.

I am not authorized to read the minds of the able and distinguished Members of the House who reported the bill to the House, but I think I am not very far wrong when I say that some of the items in the military activities of the bill, which relate to the Army, the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the general citizen soldier-training program, were cut below the Budget estimate, perhaps—and I use that word "perhaps" advisedly—in anticipation of an emphatic increase in the river and harbor item and in the hope that by keeping slashed down below the Budget estimate the appropriations actually considered necessary for the national defense some substantial increase could be made in the river and harbor appropriations. Whether that was in the minds of the House Committee on Appropriations I am not certain, but that was the result in the bill. We have more than doubled the figures of the Budget estimate in one single item, thereby making it almost impossible to treat fairly and decently and, indeed, patriotically, other items in the bill, such as those to which I have referred.

I know perfectly well that I am addressing a body of Senators who intend to support the $56,000,000 appropriation items for rivers and harbors. I think it is no violation of a confidence that should be kept when I say that I made these remarks substantially to the Committee on Appropriations. But the $56,000,000 appropriation was supported by that committee, and, of course, to use a colloquial expression, I had to take my medicine. And yet I think I owe it to myself and some other members of the committee to explain my attitude and that of those other Senators.

Last year, Mr. President, we sliced the Army probably more severely than it had ever been sliced in its history, and that on top of the slice the year before, which up to that time was the most severe in its history. We even went to the extent of dismissing from the Army—that is, dismissed from the active list—by retirement or discharge or by expedited resignations 1,400 Regular officers. More than that, we compelled the demotion of 1,800 others. We cut the enlisted strength down to 125,000 men, the smallest it has been since 1900 in proportion to our population and obligations. We have reduced it to the point where to-day there can not be mobilized in an effective manner in the United States 40,000 soldiers from the Regular Army. That is a serious matter, Mr. President, but its seriousness would not be so great if we were not threatened this year with the prospect of checking the logical and legal development of the National Guard. Having done away practically with the Regular Army as an army—for it is no longer an army in the true sense of the word; it is merely a military force scattered in tiny units over a huge continent and with garrisons overseas—having done away with the Regular Army as an army so far as mobilization effectiveness is concerned, we are confronted with the prospect of making it almost impossible to have anything else in the way of an army.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations wanted to raise the National Guard appropriation up to the Budget estimate. The House has cut it considerably below the Budget estimate, in some places very severely below, to such an extent that, in our judgment, the National Guard could not progress in accordance with the provisions of the national defense act. But we did not dare come up to the Budget estimate. Why? Because $29,000,000 had been put on in excess of the Budget estimates on the one item of rivers and harbors. The same observation holds good with respect to appropriations for the Organized Reserves. We have increased and the Senate has adopted our increase of the appropriations for the Organized Reserves, but we did not dare come up even to the Budget estimate for the Organized Reserves and the civilian military training camp or the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in the schools and colleges. Why? Because the whole plan has been thrown out of balance by this extraordinary action in doubling the Budget estimates for rivers and harbors.

Mr. SMOOT. More than doubling it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it is a trifle more than doubled. Of course, the whole idea of the Budget has gone if this method is going to prevail. If this can be done year after year, despite the advice of men who study as to where the estimated income of the United States can be most advantageously spent, if that advice is to be thrown overboard and the whole system dislocated on the score of one item which happens to control or sway a very large number of votes, we might just as well give up all idea of managing the finances of the Government of the United States in a businesslike manner in the future.

I may be swayed by my personal experience or contact with the thing when I say that I earnestly hope the river and harbor appropriations will be taken out of the bill next year. They have destroyed the effectiveness and the proper balance of the War Department appropriation bill. I can not go before the country and defend the total appropriation of $340,000,000 on the War Department appropriation bill when the estimates were only $319,000,000. How are the committees on appropriations as a body, regardless of the proclivities or special desires of some of them, going to explain to the country why they reported a bill $21,000,000 higher than the amount the President and the Director of the Budget said we had available to spend, and why they distributed that $21,000,000 excess in such a way as to crowd downward some items which should be brought upward and force upward some items which, it is conceded by the people who have studied the situation, did not need to be raised upward.

In the committee an effort was made to reduce the item very moderately. It was the ambition of some of us to report the bill to the Senate at a figure not exceeding the figure carried by the bill as the House passed it. The Committee on Appropriations found it absolutely necessary to add at least $6,000,000. Unless we were to injure the effectiveness of the National Guard and to destroy the growth and effectiveness of the Organized Reserve, we could not help adding to the bill in the military items. I will say very frankly—and I think it is no violation of confidence—that I begged those Senators who are supporting the $56,000,000 for rivers and harbors to agree to reduce the rivers and harbors item by $6,000,000, so that the bill could come before the Senate at a figure no higher than that at which it passed the House. But I had no encouragement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that it is fair to the committee to say that the amount reported out for rivers and harbors—approximately $57,000,000—was not upon a unanimous vote by any manner of means, either in the subcommittee or in the whole committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; but, nevertheless, I think the Senator will agree that the majority against us was somewhat substantial, and probably will be as to any effort made on the floor to reduce the $56,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us give everyone a chance to express himself on it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, Mr. President, I am not criticizing the Senators who stood for the $56,000,000 appropriation. They believe, of course, that that money should be spent, but where it is going to come from I do not know. The inclusion of $56,000,000 for rivers and harbors brings the total of the money thus far appropriated by this Congress in the appropriation bills thus far passed above the total of the Budget Bureau estimates for those same bills, and the Budget estimates are based primarily on the estimated income of the Government of the United States. If we are going to appropriate more money than we have income ahead, where are we going to end? We can not go on in this way.

I had hoped that we might carve the appropriation down to a reasonable extent. It would not hurt the river and harbor projects if the appropriations should be reduced to the same figure which was provided this year, that is, $42,000,000. That would be $15,000,000 over the Budget estimates for this year, but it would bring the total of the bill within reasonable limits. It would bring the total of this bill, Mr. President, just about to the figure of the Budget estimate—a trifle over it.

It may be somewhat unconventional, Mr. President, for the chairman of the subcommittee thus to express himself when that same subcommittee has expressed an opposite opinion by their vote, but, notwithstanding, the matter is so important and my connection with it is so peculiar, that I thought I was justified in stating my own views on the effect which this astonishing increase has had upon the bill as a whole.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, it is not at all uncommon for one to become—I will not say obsessed with, but persuaded of, the wisdom of making expenditures to meet governmental activities with which he is in sympathy, and for that same person to be totally out of patience with the expenditure of public funds for projects that he happens not to approve. Senators on the other side of the Chamber are hastening the passage of this bill in order that they may reach the consideration of the ship subsidy bill, which will involve appropriations of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year, and not only necessitate annual appropriations, but establish a fixed policy that will be in existence for at least 10, 15, or 20 years.

If the Senator from New York is so distressed as to how the money is to be raised in order to meet the appropriations for river and harbor appropriations, if he will join with us we will defeat the ship subsidy bill and have a surplus over this increase in the rivers and harbors appropriation.

I am not in sympathy with the Budget plan as it has been administered. I do not conceive that two or three men whose training has not been that of business men, whose whole outlook on life has been that of men who draw salaries, who never created any wealth, are by such education and training qualified to control the activities of the American people, and that they know more about the needs of this vast country, with a population of 110,000,000, than do the representatives whom the people have elected. There is not a member of the Budget committee—and I am not criticizing them—who has ever associated himself with any section of this country to such a degree that he could be returned as a Member of Congress in either branch; not because they are not as good as the men who are elected, but because they have not had the opportunity to study the problems of the country and the people in their everyday life. They do not know the needs of the people of this country; they are not in sympathy with the aspirations of the American people. Therefore I do not attribute to them any divine right to control the activities of all the American people. I am not in sympathy with the Budget system. It never was a workable project under our form of government and it never will be.

Let me remind those who talk so much about the infallibility of the Budget system that there will be deficiency appropriation after deficiency appropriation coming along. There is one on the way now. Almost before the naval appropriation bill was out of the other House, and before it was through the Senate, there was another recommendation for a tremendous emergency appropriation for the Navy. There will be others for the Army; there will be others for every activity of the Government. It is all right to talk about the infallibility of the Budget system, but the very Senators who do so know that they will be on the floor of the Senate reporting deficiency bill after deficiency bill in order to take care of the items of which the Budget Bureau never thought when they made the estimates.

I am in sympathy with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I am not informed as to his particular amendment, but I am going further than even that Senator went. The navigable streams of the country are under the exclusive and absolute control of the Federal Government. One can not improve them without the permission of the Congress of the United States. Then, can it be said that if the Government does not maintain a river and because of its failure private property is destroyed the Government is not at fault? I do not agree with such a contention. The Government controls the Missouri River and that river destroys the farm lands of North Dakota; inasmuch as that river is a Government stream, the Government owes something to the private property owners in North Dakota, not to maintain a public stream in such a way as to destroy their property.

It is a peculiar viewpoint that Congress seems to have. If the Government were to establish an industry and it was shown that it would damage private property, there is no Senator on this floor who would not vote for an appropriation to reimburse the owners of private property so damaged or destroyed. If we lay out a proving ground to use artillery for field practice we take care of the abutting property owners; and yet in the case of a great system of waterways that could be helpful, but are not, because the Government has been so parsimonious that those waterways are not only lying idle but are actually kept in such condition they destroy the property of people all along their length from source to mouth, we are told upon the floor of the Senate that the Government is under no obligation to maintain its property in such a condition that it will not destroy the private property, the lands that about the streams of individuals whom this very Government may tax. I have no patience with such a proposition. I do not expect the Congress to accept my theory, but I do say that no man upon any kind of equitable statement of the case can defend the attitude that Congress assumes of nonliability of the Government when it comes to the destruction of private property by reason of the failure of the Government properly to care for and maintain that which it uses, owns, and controls.

I think there is much merit in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota. It may be true that it would be unwise and inexpedient to adopt it in view of the policy which is laid down in this particular bill of providing lump-sum appropriations. I never favored lump-sum appropriations. I prefer each item to stand upon its merits; and I voted in the Senate against the rule which placed river and harbor appropriations in the Army appropriation bill, while the Senator who so eloquently denounced it a moment ago voted for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator can not point to any rule of the Senate which does that. That was done in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARAWAY. Here is what happened: When we consolidated the appropriations and put the various appropriation bills under the jurisdiction of one committee in the Senate this very suggestion was made. At that time it was earnestly insisted that when the appropriation bills came to the Senate we should send to the Committee on Commerce those items which had formerly been handled by that committee, to the Committee on Agriculture those items which had formerly been handled by that committee, and so forth. The Senator from New York was not in agreement with that policy, and wanted them all concentrated in one committee, and that has been done. Now he rises in his place and declaims against the policy for which he voted but against which many of us protested. I hope that we will find some solution of this question.

I do not believe in concentrated authority; I do not believe that three or four men possess all the wisdom in the world, however able they may be. I believe the collective wisdom of all the people is better than the judgment of some individual. I believe the ability of the entire Senate is more to be trusted than that of one committee, however able the membership of that committee may be—and I am not criticizing any committee. I believe that the Congress knows more than one Army officer—and I am not criticizing him, because I understand he is an excellent man, although I never saw him—and two or three hotel keepers. I should say, however, that if it were going to be left to them to get money, it was the wisest choice that could be made. [Laughter.] That system, however, is out of line with the policy of this Republic. It is an unworkable system which we have borrowed from the English Government. I am not in favor of it at all.

Here are some of the things that have happened under it: In connection with the Agricultural bill I saw the Senator in charge of that bill not make points of order against amendments which increased appropriations where it happened that he was in sympathy with the appropriation involved, and I saw him at the same time knocking down every other amendment proposing appropriations by points of order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I can not let that remark go by without correcting it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will call the Senator's attention—

Mr. McNARY. Please let me finish my statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. I was in charge of the Agricultural appropriation bill on the floor of the Senate, and wherever I thought an amendment increasing or decreasing an appropriation came within the rule as it has been interpreted I made a point of order against it, without regard to party affiliations or individuals or sections.

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall accept that statement of the Senator, but I did not even have him in mind. I had in mind the appropriation for the destruction of the barberry bush. I think it was a good thing, and it went in the bill without a protest, although it provided an increase in the appropriation, the Senator upon my right insisting that the rule did not apply. Yet when there was an effort made to extend the same principle to another appropriation the Senator who had refused to make the point of order in the first instance said, "Of course, I was merely mistaken when I did not make it against the other," and he made the point of order against that last amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not refer to me, does he?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not referring to the Senator from Utah; but I think that Senator was one who approved, and said that if the item was put in the bill in the House it was not subject to a point of order in the Senate. Did not the Senator say that?

Mr. SMOOT. I said nothing about the barberry bush in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator probably was not here, then, because no item can be passed without his talking about it if he is present. However, I was mistaken about the Senator from Utah, but one Senator actually commented upon the two items, and the Senator from Oregon knows it, and they were on the same plane. Oh, I know how it is; how impatient we are with appropriations that do not meet our approval, and how tolerant we are with those that do.

I never expect to see the Senate and Senators change in that respect. It is not human. It is only a waste of public money when we do not approve of the manner in which the money is to be expended. It is a "pork barrel" if it is being expended for some activity that does not appeal to us as wise. It is statesmanship if the appropriation is made for some activity with which we are in sympathy.

A Senator the other day was reading an editorial about the wasteful expenditure of money on the Mississippi River, and yet I never in my life heard a Senator from that section criticize the effort of the Government to reclaim a vast desert, and I do not criticize it now. I am in sympathy with it; but here is what some people fail to understand. I am speaking now of the policy advocated by the Senator from North Dakota. This Government has not any wealth of its own creation. Every dollar in the Treasury came from somebody. Somebody's sweat and brawn created it. Some other activity produced it. The Government merely collected it; and men can not do business unless the facilities for doing business are created, or within their power to create. The reclamation of the waste lands in the West, the reclaiming of the river valleys in the South, have added hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars to the national wealth. They have paid back into the Treasury of these United States twenty times more than they cost, and yet the wealth is still there, and it is not destroyed by the fact that the Government is reaping the harvest of the taxpayer from it.

There are millions of acres of farm lands that are feeding and clothing people that were made suitable for cultivation and possible for farmers to till by reason of some expenditure of the public money. There is not a spindle now turning in a New England cotton mill that has not been benefited by the expenditure of public moneys that kept the Mississippi River from destroying that great fertile valley in which most of the cotton of this country is grown. It does not inure to our benefit alone. They get more than we out of it.

The Senator from North Dakota wants to save the rich wheat fields and corn fields of North Dakota. If it were not for the wheat and the corn fields the people in the cities would starve, and the Senator who so declaims against appropriations of this kind would not have anything to clothe and feed the armies that he is so anxious to create. And yet nobody ever heard of an unwise appropriation, according to his view, if it were to be spent upon the Army or Navy. It only becomes a "pork-barrel" measure if some humble farmer in North Dakota or in Arkansas or Louisiana may be helped to contribute his little toward the feeding and clothing of the peoples of the world.

I am not in favor of the policy that we seek to lay down. I know, and the Senator from New York knows, and all those who are so eloquently proclaiming about the benefits of the Budget system, that the men who thus estimate, who restrict and direct the expenditure of public money, are not acquainted with the many activities of this Government; and if we are to become hopelessly tied to a Budget and to be dominated and controlled by a Budget, I know that this country will be developed in a one-sided way.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. If I remember rightly, the Budget system did not originate or grow up in the first place with any individual in the Senate, or with the Senate itself, or with the Congress. As I remember, the great political party of which the Senator is an honored member, as well as the opposite party, both declared for a Budget and both voted in their conventions to ask Congress for a Budget law. The President—who was not an outlaw, as perhaps some of us are, about a Budget—took up the matter. We heard from President Woodrow Wilson not only that we were to have a Budget, but that the appropriation bills should all go to one committee in the House and in the Senate, which seems to be another transgression, in the Senator's mind.

I was one of those who had some doubt about a Budget. I did not vote against it and I did not vote for it; but so long as I did not vote against it I practically voted for it, we will say. That is my remembrance of the matter. But I am satisfied that the Budget has saved a great deal of money, and although it may not be a proper thing for me to state now, as it may interject my personality a little, I want to say to the Senator that I served here some considerable time before there was a division of the different supply bills and a distribution of them to different committees.

I know that General Cockrell—an honored member of the party of which the Senator from Arkansas is a member, from Missouri, who served here for years, and a fairer man never lived or served in the Senate, in my estimation—stated on the floor of the Senate then, as the rule was adopted which distributed the appropriation bills among several committees, that that act would mean anywhere from one to several million dollars a year extra expense, and it has proven to mean that, and many times more. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate from our side of the Chamber—I think it was urged by the then chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Aldrich, who, of course, had to take care of the revenue, and so forth—that it was costing $300,000,000 a year more than was necessary. This statement was made after a few years' trial of the changed rule.

Without any bidding of the Senate, so far as I know, and without any bidding on the part of any member of the Appropriations Committee, the House took up the matter of having but one Appropriations Committee. The Bureau of the Budget, which had been almost unanimously established by the votes of both branches of Congress, changed the system of estimates and provided that certain bills should carry certain items. It made a confusion and a commotion that could hardly be met by the old way of dividing up the appropriations here, and the consequence is that the rule was passed which recognized both ways—to take the old Appropriations Committee as it stood and to add to it three members from each one of the other appropriating committees of their selection to sit with the general Appropriations Committee in considering each of such committees' one bill.

So far as I am concerned, it has made a great deal of hard work for the Appropriations Committee, but I do not regret it, and I want to commend the way in which the committee has handled it, the way in which the clerks of the committee have worked nights and Sundays and long days—and so have the members of that committee. These ex officio members who have come in and worked with us on the subcommittees have taken up the subjects with more spirit than they were ever taken up, I think, by the committees when each of them had but one appropriation bill. The facts were all there for them to obtain information as they went along; and I want to take this opportunity to commend the general committee itself and the employees of the committee, who have been so valiant in their work. I want to say that for 12 years we never have passed the appropriation bills in a short session—all of them. They have run on, even though there were only six in the Appropriations Committee, and the others were handled outside of it; every year the 4th of March of the short session has found us with a part of the appropriation bills not passed, and the consequence was the expense of an additional session.

There could not have been better service furnished in any way than has been furnished to that committee by some and in fact all of the members, the ex officio members. I have two of them in sight now, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], both of whom, I want to say, have given the best of service from first to last; and taking the expenses of this Government as a whole, as large as they may be, and as frightful as they are to look at, they would have been millions larger if this work had been divided, it does not make any difference who might have had charge of it. In my remarks concerning the division of the bills I do not allege that it is because of any intent on the part of those who have had, say, one committee and a great deal of other business; but where the committee has had only one appropriation bill it has been submerged, generally, with the other business of the committee, and it is approached by those from the outside who are designing, and the consequence is that when we have a Budget they are not infallible, it is true, but they spend the whole year in this work. Now, how much time can a Senator spend upon any one particular committee unless he is confined to one committee in this body? Yet this Budget Bureau spends the whole year in getting these things, these expense items, together, seeing what can be cut out, in the bureau's judgment, and what should be put in, and its officers then submit their work to us.

I know that the Senator from Arkansas does not want to proclaim that either he or I is an outlaw because originally we had some suspicions as to the Budget. We have to work together with those in our party, and those Budget ideas have become engrafted in the memories and thoughts of the country so that it is almost unanimous. We have to take the average, and we have to work it out, and I think it is working well.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming thought I was criticizing him, I have been unhappy in what I said.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; not at all. I did not think that.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think we are exceedingly fortunate to have the Senator from Wyoming at the head of the committee in this exceedingly difficult transition from a people's government to a bureaucracy. It does not make the method holy, though, however wise the Senator himself may be.

Here is what I started to say, and I wish to complete the statement: If all the appropriations shall be controlled by a Budget Bureau, necessarily those activities of the Government with which it is most familiar or is most in sympathy will get the larger part of the expenditures of the public funds. That is one of the frailties of human nature. There is more merit in that project with which we have sympathy than in that project with which we have no sympathy. There is also the other weakness, inherent with us, that if we are brought into constant contact with people who are interested in some particular line of legislation or governmental activity, and we like them, and they are intelligent, eventually we fall more or less under their control. Therefore, those activities of this Government which are not able and are not suited to be represented by a lobby here in Washington 12 months in the year will necessarily suffer, and those activities of the Government which are centralized here or have the ability to represent themselves by great lobbies, social and otherwise, will profit.

That is apparent when we legislate for the District of Columbia. More money can be gotten for the District of Columbia's needs, according to the amount it contributes toward the wealth of the Government, than for any other activity of this Government, because the Members of Congress are brought constantly into contact with the conditions here and with the people here, and have sympathy with the people, and an interest in and appreciation of their necessities.

Those things with which people are not constantly brought into contact, usually, without being unfair, but through lack of information, and therefore no sympathy, that is easily demonstrated. For instance, everybody knows that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is a splendid man, a just man, yet he has offered an amendment which he knows is vital to the situation in his State, and members of his own party, but from different sections of the country, are pointing to it as an unjust and indefensible effort upon his part to localize expenditures which are contained in a lump-sum appropriation. That is the misfortune in this very system. He loves his country, and he knows its needs. He is not unmindful of the needs of the rest of the country, but under the Budget system he stands here with his hands tied, because the Budget did not know anything about the necessities of the farmers and the business men and the stock growers along the great valley of the Missouri River in North and South Dakota. They gave $25,000 for an activity which he says is worthy of $250,000, and I say that he knows more about it than General Lord, who never saw North Dakota, possibly, and, if it were not colored, I doubt whether he could point to it on the map; but I am not criticizing General Lord.

Mr. BORAH. He is color blind?

Mr. CARAWAY. It is one of the handicaps of life that men who devote all their activities to some particular line do not appreciate other activities in other localities. We all noticed quite a while ago the acrimonious discussion between two branches of the Navy, one branch insisting that the air was the best defense, and that they could show that the battleships were obsolete, or obsolescent; the other contending that the battleship was the first line of defense. One knew how to fly; the other knew how to sail. Neither appreciated the other, because their whole interest was wrapped up in the line of activity with which they were familiar.

The gentlemen who handle the Army appropriations believe the Army is the one essential thing, that if you could get everybody into uniform, and could get spurs on their boots, although they might not know a horse from a cow if the cow were dehorned, civilization would be safe. The other believes that if you could get all the wealth of this country into battleships everybody else could sleep securely at night. The centralization of authority is the thing against which I am protesting, giving a few men who can not know personally the needs and wants of this country the control of the resources of every man and woman, from mountain to sea, and from Canada to Mexico. It is wrong, and the system that puts into one committee all this power is wrong, although I will state, so as not to get into any argument with them, that that committee contains more than half the wisdom of the Senate.

I am satisfied that no more disinterested Senator sits on this floor than the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I have a very high regard for him. I am sure that in his heart of hearts he believes that every dollar which is appropriated to be spent for the great harbor of New York is a wise appropriation of public money, and that it would be sacrilegious to cut one penny from it. Yet he has no patience at all with the Senator from North Dakota, and believes that the Senator from North Dakota is trying to raid the Treasury. It is because he does not appreciate the situation in North Dakota. It is the system against which I am proclaiming.

My good friend from Utah, sitting over there, who is going to vote against every item in this appropriation for rivers and harbors and be sorry there are not more of them to vote against, is one of the best men in the Senate. He is one of the few men who have the courage to vote against local measures and do it every time. The other day he was reading with approval an editorial from the Chicago Tribune which was "cursing" out the expenditures on the lower Mississippi, and he was approving that paper as a second Daniel come to judgment. In a subsequent paragraph it said we were committing a sublime folly in cutting to the bone the Army and Navy appropriations, and then the Senator from Utah said, "This man is exactly right when he talks about rivers and harbors, but he is feeble-minded when he is talking about the Army and the Navy." It depends on the viewpoint.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. The Senator is so kind in his allusion to me that I want to ask if he would indulge me while I state that heretofore I gave notice that I would offer an amendment calling for an international conference with all nations with which we hold diplomatic relations for the purpose of reducing the Army and the Navy; and in view of the fact that a number of Senators have asked me whether I was going to ask for a vote on that amendment I want to give notice that I shall ask for a vote on it to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator will find the Senator from New York almost reading the Senator out of polite society for daring to lay his hand on the Army.

Mr. KING. Let me say to my good friend, with respect to his observation about my attitude upon rivers and harbors, that I am not quite as radical as my friend assumes. I think there are some items in this bill which are quite admirable, and I should vote for a very liberal river and harbor bill. I think some of these items may not be justified, and may I say to my good friend from Arkansas, whom I love very dearly, that I should be glad if we could evolve a system of dealing with this very important subject that would be, if I may use the expression, scientific, reasonable, just, and fair, and for that purpose and to that end I had the honor to submit upon two or three different occasions an amendment to river and harbor bills calling for the creation by law of a commission consisting of two Army engineers and three men of ability in business and in engineering, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who should have authority to survey the whole field and make reports as to what projects should be developed, and approximately the amount which should be appropriated from time to time for the development of those projects, submitting their reports to Congress for Congress's approval, and then that we should make appropriations in lump sums to that commission, and they should expend them according to their wisdom. I should heartily support a project of that kind.

Mr. WARREN. That would be passing the buck to the other fellow.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; that would be a still greater concentration of authority, and a surrendering of all the obligations and duties that rest upon us to legislate. Of course, the time will not come in my short life, but I wish we could get rid of bureaus, instead of multiplying them. I have never seen wisdom grow out of bureaucracy. As other countries get rid of bureaus and bureaucracy, we set them up.

Mr. WARREN. We provide for them by resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course. We will suspend anything to create a bureau, and turn over to it the administration of governmental functions for which it has no capacity and in the administration of which it displays no sympathy. Let us bear our own responsibilities without sheltering ourselves behind the Budget or any other bureau.

I am not talking about the Senator from Utah, but he suggests to me that a great many people refuse to project themselves into the future and exercise any imagination about advantages that may come from the expenditure of public funds. Unless they can see that there are so many thousand tons hauled on a river to-day, they say, "It is a waste of public revenue to appropriate for the improvement of that river because now there is no commerce."

Let us see that river improvements, both for the benefit of navigation and for the benefit of people who create the wealth of this country, have a fair chance. Here is a bill carrying three hundred and some odd million dollars. Fifty-six million of it is for the improvement of the waterways and harbors which are to care for the commerce of this country. Nearly $300,000,000 is for an Army. The Senator from New York shakes his head. How much is for the Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Two hundred and fifty million dollars.

Mr. CARAWAY. What are the other things appropriated for besides rivers and harbors?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Panama Canal Zone, national soldiers' homes, all the national military parks, all the national cemeteries, the Alaska roads and trails, and Alaska cable.

Mr. CARAWAY. I remember.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Quite a number of things.

Mr. CARAWAY. It all comes back to this, that the expenditure of $250,000,000 for an Army is the part of wisdom, but the expenditure of $56,000,000 to take care of the commerce of 110,000,000 people, and do something for the reclamation of this great country of ours, is an extravagant and indefensible waste of public revenue. Our attitude depends on our viewpoint, Mr. President.

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, I want to say merely a few words, and I shall detain the Senate only a few minutes.

I am sorry there has been much discussion about the river and harbor item in the bill. The item seems to come in every year for more or less talk, and I presume we are lucky in having adopted the lump-sum system, because if we had all the items in the bill, as we used to have, it would take us a week or so, as it used to take us, to pass the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. RANDELL. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. In passing a river and harbor bill, wherever it originated or wherever it ended, have we ever escaped having a great many hours of discussion?

Mr. RANDELL. We have escaped passing a wise bill several times. We have many times escaped doing what the Engineer Corps of the Army asked us to do in regard to the river and harbor items. The Engineer Corps of the Army is not responsible for these matters. They are charged with a duty and they have very wisely and well, in my judgment, performed the duty imposed upon them in this matter. We have told the engineers of the Army that they must look after the waterway improvements of this great Nation, and in the past, my senatorial friends, when they have said they needed a million dollars we have rarely ever given them more than $500,000, and when they have said they needed $50,000,000 we have rarely ever given them $25,000,000.

I have been a close student of the subject during the 23 years of my congressional life, and I can testify that we have never heretofore given the Engineer Corps of the Army what they said could be wisely expended. This is the first time in the history of the American Congress of which I am aware, Mr. President and Senators, when the Congress of the United States has proposed to give to the Engineer Corps what they have said could be wisely and profitably and advantageously spent during the ensuing 12 months. If anyone can show me where we have done it before, I wish they would do so, because I do not recall it.

This time the engineers were specially questioned about it. They did not advocate it; they did not lobby for it; but when brought before the committees of Congress and asked what sum they could profitably expend on all the great waterways during the coming 12 months, they said the amount was $56,590,000. They were asked then, "Where do you propose to expend that sum?" They gave the information in itemized form, and I am going to go over it to some extent in a few moments. They said, "The Members of Congress have approved the various waterways. You have said by your action that the waterways should be improved. You have told us to go ahead and improve them. If you want them improved, give us the money. We can not do it without the money. We can not make the success that was made at Panama unless you give us the money as the engineers of Panama were given the money."

It is "a shame for us to adopt these projects and hold the Engineer Corps of the Army responsible and to expect results from them and then not give them the money. We have gotten remarkable results in many of the great harbors of the country. Why? Because we have given to the harbors on the Great Lakes, on the Atlantic, on the Gulf, and on the Pacific the necessary sums of money to improve those harbors properly. Now, I do not say that there was anything improper or sinister in improving the harbors and not improving the rivers, but I wish to call it to the attention of the Senate that the harbors are railroad terminals and the rivers are railroad competitors. Senators can draw their own inference or conclusion from that statement. A harbor is a place at which the railroad runs its trains alongside the ship and unloads its cargo into the ship, or takes a cargo out of the ship. It is a terminal. The railroads have always assisted in securing liberal appropriations for the improvement of the harbors, and the harbors in the main have not suffered.

But, sirs, we have not improved the great rivers of the country which compete with the railways. In 1876 we began to improve the Ohio River much as it should be, though it is not now a great competitor of the railways. It should carry an immense volume of commerce. Since 1876 we have spent considerable money on the Ohio River, but we have never brought the project to completion. Finally in 1910 we adopted definitely a specific project of a 9-foot channel on the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo. That was 13 years ago. It was said we would finish it in 10 years. We are nothing like through with the project. If we would give the engineers all the money they should have, they could finish the Ohio project in five or six years more.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, the same engineers, who have lagged so long with the Ohio River from 1876 up to the present time, finished the Panama Canal, which is certainly as great an engineering work as there is on any one of our rivers, in a period of 10 years. Why did they finish the Panama Canal within 10 years? Why, sirs, it was done because we gave them the money; we permitted them to go ahead with the work; we acted in a businesslike, sensible way. If we would act in the same businesslike, sensible way in regard to the waterway improvements of the country, we would get similar results.

What would be the benefit to the Nation? The transportation people tell us that there have been no railroad lines of any consequence built in the last three or four years.

Mr. Rea, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in testifying about one year ago before a committee of Congress, said that the railroads of the United States during the previous year had constructed 400 miles and lost 700 miles. The net loss to the railroad system of America was 300 miles. The best railroad experts of America say that transportation doubles every 10 years. The demands of this great country upon the transportation systems of the country double every 10 years, but there has been no railroad mileage doubling during the last 10 years, and there has been no doubling in the number of cars or engines on the railroads.

We need the waterways to help carry freight. A very large volume of freight could be carried on the waterways if properly improved. It should be so carried. The waterways were established by the Creator of the world thousands of years before there were any railways and thousands of years before there were any highways. They are natural carriers of freight. They carry freight cheaper than any other agency can possibly carry it, and we should utilize them to the fullest extent.

Mr. President and Senators, this is the first time in my experience that we are giving the Engineer Corps of the Army a fair show; that we are giving them the money to carry on their work. Do not let the Senate take a backward step now after the House has gone forward to give every dollar the engineers say they can spend wisely. After the Appropriations Committee of this body have recommended to us the giving of the same sum of money which the engineers need, do not let us take a step backward now by refusing to approve the item.

What is the money for? Some Senators do not seem to understand what is to be done with the money. I shall not go into all the items, but I wish to refer to just a few from the testimony of General Taylor, assistant to the Chief of Engineers. He prepared a table which was attached to his testimony and which shows, in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, the amount that can be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, for the maintenance and improvement of river and harbor work, including commerce also for 1921. The table has already been placed in the Record by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I shall not put it in the Record again, but I wish to call attention to just a few items.

I see at the start, under the head of "Principal seacoast harbors," a proposed expenditure of $318,000 for New York Harbor, N. Y., where there was a commerce in 1921 of 22,117,535 tons, a colossal commerce. The commerce of America, to a great extent, comes into that harbor.

For East River, N. Y., there is a proposed expenditure of $3,025,000, and the commerce through that river was $32,071,134. That was also a colossal commerce.

For Staten Island Sound, N. Y., there is a proposed expenditure of $1,000,000. The commerce there in 1921 was $23,122,843.

On the Delaware River, from Philadelphia to the sea, there is a proposed expenditure of about $3,000,000. In 1921 the commerce was 15,612,616 tons. I have not the value of that commerce, but it was enormous.

For the Baltimore Channel there is a proposed expenditure of $650,000, and the commerce during the year 1921 was 11,911,846 tons.

For the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi River, in my own State, there is a proposed expenditure of $1,500,000. The commerce there in 1921 was 15,123,063 tons.

For Galveston Harbor there is a proposed expenditure out of this item of $90,000. The commerce there in 1921 was 13,621,173 tons.

For San Francisco Harbor the proposed expenditure is $340,000 and the commerce is 8,302,725 tons.

For the Hudson River Channel, N. Y., there is a proposed expenditure of $100,000 and the commerce there in 1921 was 35,168,448 tons.

For Norfolk Harbor, Va., there is a proposed expenditure of $550,000 and the commerce there in 1921 was 11,623,673 tons.

For Seattle Harbor, in Washington, the proposed expenditure is the infinitesimal sum of $10,000. The commerce was 4,117,002 tons. The total amount proposed for all of the great harbors which I have named and for many others under this bill is $19,683,410 for improvement and $7,375,400 for maintenance, or a total of $27,058,810. No man in the Senate, no man in the Union, can criticize one single dollar of all those items of appropriation for the great harbors in this country. I have not heard anyone even attempt to offer a criticism.

Then under the second heading are "Secondary harbors and coastwise channels." I will refer to a few of them. They are considered secondary, it will be observed. I find for Bridgeport Harbor, Conn., a proposed expenditure of $97,000, while the commerce there last year was 762,419 tons. For the Delaware River, from Philadelphia to Trenton, there is a proposed expenditure of $25,000. On that waterway there was a commerce of 1,760,220 tons. On the Potomac River, coming up from the sea to this city, there is a proposed expenditure of $74,000, and the commerce last year was 891,792 tons.

I ask leave to embody in my remarks, without reading, some additional figures as to proposed river and harbor expenditures and as to the volume of commerce.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. RANSEDELL. I have not concluded my remarks, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. RANSEDELL. I shall be delighted if I can answer the question.

Mr. WILLIS. If it will not interrupt the course of the Senator's argument, I should be glad if, before he takes his seat, he would call attention to the tremendous tonnage that is carried from certain ports in Ohio, together with the comparatively small appropriations which are made therefor. The Senator will find that on page 7. I particularly invite his attention to those figures, for it seems to me they are very interesting.

Mr. RANSEDELL. I will say to the Senator that I have every one of those ports marked, to be inserted in my remarks. Starting with Toledo Harbor, for instance, on which an expenditure is proposed of only $50,000, the commerce was 9,202,109 tons. At Conneaut Harbor, where the proposed expenditure is $33,000, the commerce was 1,800,000; and so on. I would gladly call attention to each one of them did time permit. There is a colossal commerce, let me say, at each one of these harbors, while the expenditure is very small.

Mr. President, I happened to be a Member of the House of Representatives many years ago when the improvement of those harbors was under way. It cost very considerable sums, let me say to the Senator, properly to improve those harbors; but they were improved, and wisely improved, to the great advantage of the American people. The engineers were given the money to improve them. I called attention to the fact that I had never known any failure of appropriations for harbors which are railroad terminals. Let me repeat, whenever there is a harbor which is going to assist the railroad to unload its freight and to load its freight for that harbor liberal appropriations are provided by Congress. If the Senator will go back to the appropriation bills of 25 or 30 years ago, in which provision was made for the improvement of the various harbors to which he alludes, he will find that we were spending a great deal more money on them than is proposed to be expended now. They are completed works—they are finished—we do not have to spend money on them now, thank goodness. A great many of the projects for which the money in this bill is proposed to be expended will be finished in the reasonably near future.

Let me say that one of the greatest expenditures in this bill is about $7,000,000 for the Ohio River in the Senator's own State. When that $7,000,000 shall have been expended and about $13,000,000 additional—for it will cost $20,000,000 to finish the project—we shall have a permanent system of locks and dams on the Ohio River. We shall not have to spend any more money on the Ohio River. We shall have works made of concrete and steel that will last practically forever. The whole American Republic will derive the greatest benefit from the cheap freight that will go down the Ohio River from the Pittsburgh district.

Do Senators realize that the Pittsburgh district on the Ohio River is the greatest freight center in the world? There is nothing comparable to it anywhere on earth. It is said that the combined freight of the Pittsburgh district—by that I mean the city of Pittsburgh, up the Monongahela River a few miles, and down the river for 50 miles—is greater than all the freight of the five greatest ports on earth; greater than the freight of New York, London, Liverpool, Hongkong, and Antwerp combined. It is a marvelous section. That freight is composed largely of iron and coal and steel and the products thereof and many other minerals. That tremendous production will go down the Ohio River on this improved canalized stream, which will be 9 feet deep from Pittsburgh to Cairo. It will go down to the Mississippi on the improved Mississippi. It will cheapen transportation to a remarkable extent for all the middle and western sections of our country and for foreigners who buy our products, for, let me say to Senators, it is infinitely cheaper to carry freight 2,000 miles to the Gulf of Mexico by water than to carry it 400 miles across the mountains to the Atlantic Ocean. The whole country will derive benefit from that great improvement.

Again let me ask the Senator from Ohio to join in helping to complete the great work on that great river in his State, as we did complete the work on the great harbors in the northern part of his State.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. RANSDALL. I will be delighted to answer the Senator if I can.

Mr. KING. While the Senator was referring to the tremendous quantity of freight which had its origin in and about Pittsburgh and his prophecy as to what would be the future of traffic upon the Ohio River, I was wondering what proportion of the freight which had its origin in the district to which the Senator refers goes to New Orleans and to territory that would be reached from the port in New Orleans. If the Mississippi River is so valuable for that purpose, why has it not been used in the past for the purpose of transporting coal and iron and steel and what not from the Pittsburgh district to New Orleans?

Mr. RANSDALL. For the simple reason that the river has never been completely improved. There is a period of several months during low water it is possible to wade across the Ohio River at many points. So the river can not be used except during the season of high water, which is a very limited period. When the improvement of the river is completed by canalization, as it will be under the existing project, the river will have an annual, all-the-year-around depth of 9 feet, except for a brief period when it may be closed by ice. Where there is a sure and certain period of navigation, commerce is bound to flow that way, because river transportation is so much cheaper than rail transportation.

In the early days, I may say to the Senator, before there were any railroads in operation and when the only means of transportation on land was by wagon, there was a very large commerce on the Ohio River which went down that river and the Mississippi in flatboats following the spring floods, and then the boats were broken up at the city of New Orleans. However, after the railroads began operation, the Senator knows very well that a railroad which operates 365 days in the year is certainly going to be used instead of a river which can not operate anything like 150 days during the year. There must be certainty of transportation; it must be steady; it must be reliable. That is why the Ohio River has not been used, but it will be used when the improvement is completed.

Senators, I do not propose to discuss this measure any further. The House passed this item, it has been recommended by the Appropriations Committee, and is now before us. I think we should adopt it; I think we should give the engineers of the Army a chance to see what they can do with the various projects which have been approved. One thing is certain: We ought either to give them money to finish the improvement of our great interior waterways or we ought to make a declaration that we do not intend to improve them—one or the other. It is unwise, it is foolish in the extreme to carry on these works for an indefinite period, well knowing that we can derive no material benefit from them until they are completed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I had not thought of saying anything at all concerning this item at this time, but the remarks which were indirectly addressed to me by my good friend, the able Senator from Louisiana, seem to make it necessary that I should say a word in order that he and others may not misunderstand my position.

I am delighted to know—indeed, I had no doubt about the matter—that the Senator from Louisiana is in favor of appropriations for really meritorious works in connection with rivers and harbors. I do not need, however, to be urged by him to support such appropriations, because I have always been in favor of them and have openly so stated.

The Senator, I think, knows the ground of my objection to some features of this bill. As I said this morning, I am in favor of appropriations for improvements that begin somewhere and end somewhere, that are part of a real system. There are items in this bill, Mr. President, that are open, I think, to proper criticism. Without referring to any particular one, except as I may refer to the figures as I glance over them, let me call the attention of the Senate to an appropriation of $4,100 for a project where, so far as the figures show, there is no commerce at all.

Mr. RANSDALL. Will the Senator give the name?

Mr. WILLIS. Here is another item of $4,000 for the improvement of a river where last year there were only 1,500 tons of commerce. I notice another item of $10,000 for a project where there were only 5,000 tons of commerce.

Here is another interesting item, being an estimate of $9,000 for maintenance of a project where last year there were only 80 tons of commerce. That is a large amount to pay for the transportation of 80 tons of freight. I note another item of $15,000—

Mr. RANSDALL. Mr. President, will not the Senator kindly go a little more into detail, so that we may examine the facts as to the various projects? I do not know to what items the Senator is referring.

Mr. WILLIS. I am referring to page 6 of the report, a copy of which the Senator has. My eye caught on page 6 an item of $15,000 for the maintenance of a project where there were carried last year 40 tons of commerce. It would seem to me that that would be a rather high rate to pay for the transportation of 40 tons of freight, and that expenditure is merely for the maintenance of the improvement. Here is another one, just a few lines below that, where $2,000 was paid out last year and only twelve hundred and odd tons of commerce were carried.

It seems to me that those items are properly subject to criticism; but, since the Senator was referring to the matter, I desire to place in the RECORD at this point, without reading all of them, some items of appropriations relative to my own State.

The Senator very properly has referred to Toledo Harbor, which, as he has correctly stated, was improved a number of years ago. I invite his attention to the fact that there are only eight harbors in the whole United States that have a larger commerce than Toledo. Those eight harbors are New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Galveston, Duluth-Superior, and Buffalo.

The next one in point of importance is Toledo, with over 9,000,000 tons of commerce the last year, for which we have figures, and yet an appropriation for maintenance of only $50,000 is made. As the Senator has correctly said, large amounts were expended in making that improvement, and yet, as I happen to know personally, the amount that is now provided for maintenance is not sufficient to keep that improvement in workable condition. In other words, the channel that has been made at great expense is gradually closing up.

Here is another to which he referred—Conneaut Harbor. Last year that harbor had 7,800,000 tons of commerce, and yet for maintenance, as suggested here, there is given only $8,000.

What I am complaining about is that we are liberal in the appropriations for places that have practically no commerce and no guaranty that there will be any, and yet we are parsimonious when it comes to making appropriations for places where there actually is some commerce and some probability that it may increase.

I ask unanimous consent to place in the Record at this time the statement of the appropriations proposed for the various Ohio projects on Lake Erie.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The statement referred to is as follows:

Locality.	Improve- ment.	Mainte- nance.	Commerce 1921 (tons).
Toledo Harbor, Ohio.....		$50,000	9,202,109
Sandusky Harbor, Ohio.....	$58,000	10,000	2,427,220
Huron Harbor, Ohio.....		5,500	2,214,631
Lorain Harbor, Ohio.....		5,000	4,941,882
Cleveland Harbor, Ohio.....		25,000	6,200,362
Fairport Harbor, Ohio.....		5,000	1,945,310
Ashtabula Harbor, Ohio.....		5,000	6,401,667
Conneaut Harbor, Ohio.....		25,000	7,800,000

Mr. WILLIS. It thus appears that for Ohio projects located on Lake Erie only $83,000 is proposed to be spent for new work in the year for which appropriation is being made, and $113,000 for maintenance, or a total of $196,000 for the year, although the commerce of those ports in 1921 aggregated 41,000,000 tons, or over 200 tons of freight for every dollar spent for improvement and maintenance per annum.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator is reading from the recommendations of the engineers?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the Senator proposes in this case to follow their recommendations blindly?

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator is referring to my opposition to his amendment which I voiced some time ago, I was replying to the suggestions that were made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] touching the appropriations that were made for Ohio. Yes; I know of no other way. I will say to the Senator frankly that if we start in, if we adopt the Senator's amendment, then there are going to be amendments offered here touching a number of these items, and we probably will get no river and harbor bill, and may not get any Army appropriation bill at all. So I think it is unwise to adopt his amendment, though I think the items I referred to are unjust so far as Ohio is concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the debate nominally upon the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has proceeded far afield. A large part of it has been devoted to the general policy of the appropriations for rivers and harbors rather than to the amendment that is before the Senate. I desire to say a few words in relation to that amendment.

The policy of making lump-sum appropriations was adopted by the Congress because of the scandal—and it can be described by no more temperate term—arising from log-rolling appropriations for creeks and little streams on which there never was any commerce and probably never would be any commerce, and many of which were of such a trifling character that the ordinary supply of water had to be augmented artificially in order to float any kind of a boat on them.

The Missouri River is not in that class, Mr. President, at any point below Fort Benton. It is a matter of history that early in the last century, immediately following the historic exploration of Lewis and Clark, a very considerable commerce was developed on the Missouri River. It was incident to the romantic fur trade that was carried on through all that Northwest country. Indeed, Mr. President, the navigation was not confined to the main stream, but extended up the great tributary, the Yellowstone, as far as where the city of Billings now is. It was so important, Mr. President, that Fort Benton was established by the Government as a military post away back in 1846, and became the distributing point for an enormous commerce that was carried on not only with the adjacent territory within the United States but with the Canadian posts in the Northwest Territory.

After gold had been discovered in Montana, the commerce reached very gigantic proportions; and accordingly the Missouri River has always been regarded as a stream worthy of consideration in connection with the appropriations made in the annual rivers and harbors bill. In recent years, when the work has been carried on more systematically, the Missouri River has been divided for the purpose of making appropriations into three parts—the part extending from the mouth to Kansas City, the part extending from Kansas City to Sioux City, and the part extending from Sioux City to Fort Benton. Each of these is considered a project, and none of them are new projects at all. They are old projects, for the prosecution of which appropriations have been made for many years.

I turn, for instance, at random, to the statutes for the year 1912, and find at page 219, in the appropriation bill for that year for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the following in relation to the Missouri:

Improving Missouri River: For improvement and maintenance from Kansas City to Sioux City, $75,000; for improvement and maintenance from Sioux City to Fort Benton, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 91, Sixty-second Congress, first session, $150,000; in all, $225,000.

And for the succeeding year the appropriation, found on page 818 of the volume of statutes for 1911–13, includes the following item:

Improving Missouri River: For improvement and maintenance from Kansas City to Sioux City, $150,000, of which amount at least $75,000 may be expended for such bank revetment as in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers may be in the interests of navigation; continuing improvement and for maintenance from Sioux City to Fort Benton, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 91, Sixty-second Congress, first session, $175,000, of which amount, because of present emergency, an amount not exceeding $75,000 may be expended for such bank revetment above Elk Point as in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers may be necessary to extend and protect existing revetments and regulate channel flow in the interest of navigation; in all, $325,000.

But the question as to whether the project falls within the general description of the projects upon which improvements are to be made seems to be settled by the last report of the Chief Engineer of the Army, on page 1284, which speaks of the improvement of the Missouri River between Sioux City and Fort Benton as an existing project. The history of the improvement is there detailed, and it speaks of the original condition of previous projects and of the existing project, so that it is simply a question as to whether the allotment ought to be made here or ought to be made by the Army engineers.

It is now said that the tonnage in this part of the river is not extensive; and that is, of course, true. The appropriations that have been made have been proportionately small; but, Mr. President, the fact that the commerce in that part of the river is not as great as it once was does not distinguish it in any respect from other projects which have received favorable consideration from the Army engineers.

The simple question presented by this amendment is as to whether the total amount of $1,540,000 to be expended upon the Missouri River shall be distributed as proposed by the engineers—namely, $1,500,000 between Kansas City and the mouth of the river, $25,000 between Kansas City and Sioux City, and $15,000 between Sioux City and Fort Benton, a distance of nearly 1,500 miles—or whether a larger amount of that allotment to the Missouri River shall be expended above.

I called attention to the fact that the rather small commerce carried on in the upper Missouri during the last few years was due obviously to the paucity of the crop in that locality. As they improve, and as greater development takes place, we may reasonably hope that the commerce will increase; but I call attention to the fact—

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I state right here that even to-day I was informed that the boat lines running and operating now would haul between 550,000 and 750,000 bushels of wheat alone of the crop of 1922, provided they can at all times get up to the landing places; and with 700,000 bushels that would be 21,000 tons of wheat alone, showing a vast improvement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

I desire to call attention to the amount of commerce on the river between Kansas City and the mouth of the river, upon which this very considerable sum of $1,500,000 is to be expended.

In 1917 the commerce was 217,616 tons; in 1918, 142,981 tons; in 1919, 141,094 tons; in 1920, 203,153 tons; and in 1921, 139,544 tons. That is to say, in five years there has been a falling off in that commerce of something like 40 per cent, a very much higher falling off than there has been on the upper reaches of the river.

Accordingly, Mr. President, it becomes simply a question as to whether the Congress is going to surrender absolutely and without any control whatever the distribution of the funds which it provides as between different sections of one particular river to the judgment of these Army engineers. As pointed out by the Senator from Arkansas, few of them are trained business men. It becomes a very serious question, a serious question of wisdom from a political and economical standpoint, as to whether this enormous expenditure ought to be made in that section of the country, which is rich, which is populous, which is densely settled, and leave entirely without consideration and without care those sections of the country which need development, which require assistance, and which ought to have the consideration of the Government in order to afford cheaper facilities for transportation.

Moreover, Mr. President, it is to be borne in mind that much of the region that is affected by the appropriation which is asked by this amendment is distant from the terminal markets. That portion of my State which would be benefited by the appropriation if it were made lies at least from 600 to 1,100 miles from the market, an enormous distance to carry the products, and necessarily a large amount of what is realized for the goods goes for transportation. It is an exceedingly great burden upon those people to have to carry their freight to the distant railroad points when it might conveniently be taken to river points and carried on boats down to the railroad crossings, whence they might proceed to the terminal markets. It is a question of policy which I undertake to say Army engineers are not very competent to pass upon.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I am interested in the argument the Senator is making about reaching the terminal markets, and I am not able to follow him in it. As I understand it, the amendment which he is supporting provides improvement on the Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. WILLIS. But nothing is proposed for the section on down to Kansas City. How does the Senator expect the shippers to reach the terminal markets by such an improvement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from North Dakota made it perfectly clear that the carriage would be from the interior points to the points where the river is crossed by the railroads. The Missouri River is crossed by the Northern Pacific at Bismarck, and crossed by the Great Northern at Buford, so that both lines of railroads crossing the river would take up at those two points grain destined for Minneapolis or Duluth.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the Senator's argument on that point, but I thought he was contending that this would help the development of a system whereby there would be water transportation to the terminal markets. I misunderstood the Senator's line of argument.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; never since the early days has there been any considerable amount of freight carried down the Missouri River to St. Louis, for instance, or to New Orleans. That is not a consummation that is likely to arise. I may say to the Senator, however, that I should think that in the distribution of these funds a very considerable amount might also be allotted to the improvement between Kansas City and Sioux City. It seems to me that of the amount appropriated for the improvement of the river the allotment of $1,500,000 to that section of the river between Kansas City and the mouth is entirely unjustified, and I have not heard anybody upon this floor undertake to justify it as a matter of comparison with the other sections of the river. I undertake to say that the Senator from Ohio will not undertake to justify it upon anything found even in the report of the engineers upon the subject.

Mr. WILLIS. I make no comment about it. I was seeking to understand the Senator's argument.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am sure the Senator will not comment on it, nor has any other Senator undertaken to make any comment to justify that distribution of the amount which is set apart for the improvement of the Missouri River. Accordingly, I hope that this amendment will prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. KING. I think, upon this amendment, a quorum should be present, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. NORRIS. Let the amendment be reported.

The READING CLERK. On page 106, after the numerals in line 12, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $250,000 of this appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended between Sioux City, Iowa, and Fort Benton, Mont., for the removal of obstructions, the revetment of shores where the same may be necessary, and for the maintenance of the channel to landing places and at points where the railroads intersect the Missouri River, said last-mentioned sum to be immediately available.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and vote "nay."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair upon this and all matters relating to the pending bill with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is necessarily detained from the Chamber. Not knowing how he would vote upon the pending amendment, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I understand that he would vote as I am about to vote. So I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair on the pending bill with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], but on this amendment he would vote as I shall do. So I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

So Mr. McCUMBER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is now 5 minutes past 5, and it is desired to have an executive session this evening. I think probably the Senate is not in a mood to do any more work on the bill to-night. Therefore I desire to present a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate, at not later than 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, shall proceed to vote, without further debate, upon all amendments which may be pending to the river and harbor item of the bill.

Mr. KING. A number of amendments will be offered to-morrow, among them one of which I am about to give notice, dealing with the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But I am not asking unanimous consent in connection with anything other than the river and harbor item. I know of other amendments, of course, which are to be offered to other portions of the bill.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that an amendment will be offered to strike out the entire appropriation carried in the bill for rivers and harbors. In order to emphasize the point that was made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I will state that that will take some time. There will be several amendments offered with reference to the same item, for instance, proposing to reduce it to the amount provided in the Budget estimate. I have several other amendments with relation to the same subject matter. I have no objection, however, if the Senator would fix a later hour.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator think that in three hours of debate to-morrow we can dispose of the amendments which may be pending?

Mr. KING. If the Senator would make it 3 o'clock I would have no objection. I promise the Senator that I shall attempt to facilitate the disposition of the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. KING. That is, as to items dealing with the river and harbor paragraph?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just the river and harbor paragraph.

Mr. McCUMBER. To dispose of it finally at that hour?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I object.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he has an objection to fixing an hour at any time on the river and harbor item?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the debate we have had to-day signifies a great many views as to requirements for the use of an enormous amount of the fund that is proposed to be appropriated, and there ought to be time enough to debate it and to prepare for amendments to cut down the appropriation. I doubt if we can prepare them and have them debated properly during to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator from New York to ask consent to vote without further debate only upon the pending amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; pending amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not those that may be offered hereafter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; if I spoke in that way I should have said amendments then pending. There are no amendments pending now. Of course, I know some will be offered to-morrow.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Why not vote now? There is nothing pending.

Mr. BORAH. There will be something pending if there is a necessity for something to be pending.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The inquiry of the Senator from Louisiana is an entirely intelligent one, except that the Senator from New York happens to know that amendments would be offered immediately. Anticipating that, I thought the Senate might like to get away from here this evening in a few moments after simply laying out a program for to-morrow. I desire to change my request, and I call this to the attention of the Senator from North Dakota. Would the Senator from North Dakota be willing to make it half-past 3 o'clock?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that we should be bound, when it comes to the expenditure of some $29,000,000 more than the Director of the Budget called for, to such a very short time. It does not seem to me that we ought to be limited to two or three hours of debate to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would give us four and one-half hours.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would think there ought to be some explanation of why it is necessary to ask $29,000,000 over and above what the Director of the Budget estimated for and over and above the estimates of the engineers, when it has already been called to our attention that the engineers have made estimates for enormous expenditures where there will be no commerce whatever. I think it would take the Senator from New York more than three or four hours to explain why we should have the extra $29,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber this afternoon when I attempted to explain why the appropriation was in the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was in the Chamber all day, and I fully understand why the appropriation is in the bill, but unless we are to bow slavishly to whatever may be the dictate of the engineers, then we ought to have at least some reason given by the Senator in charge of the bill why we should more than double even the estimates of the engineers. We ought to go over the items for which they have estimated one after another and ascertain the necessity for them. Unless we are going simply to surrender to them, we ought to have the Senator from New York explain their necessity and what advantage would be obtained by the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before that task is put to me, I beg to say that I shall not undertake it. There are other Senators who are better informed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean to say that he will advocate the swallowing of the pill, large as it is, without knowing what is in it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only this afternoon I protested against it. Why does the Senator ask that question?

Mr. McCUMBER. As the Senator in charge of the bill, I would suppose he would have something to say further than merely making a general protest, and that he would show why it is improper to allow this item and that item.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator opposed to fixing any time to-morrow?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; any time to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, there is no use making any further requests.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to give the following notice:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall move to suspend paragraph 3 of Rule XVI of the Standing Rules for the purpose of proposing to the Army appropriation bill H. R. 13793 the following amendment:

"At the proper place in the bill, insert the following:
 "That in conformity with the act entitled 'An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands,' approved August 20, 1916, the Philippine Legislature is hereby authorized to provide for a general election of delegates to a constitutional convention which shall prepare and formulate a constitution for an independent republican government for the Philippine Islands, and that upon the ratification and promulgation of said constitution and the election of the officers therein provided for and upon satisfactory proof that the government provided for under said constitution is organized and ready to function, the President of the United States shall recognize and proclaim the independence of the Philippine government under said constitution and shall notify the governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence thereof, and shall invite said governments to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands; and that the President is directed to withdraw the military forces of the United States from said islands within six months after said proclamation recognizing the independence of said Philippine government."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to make a request? I wish to move an executive session.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from New York a few moments ago to ask that the Senate vote on the pending items in the bill not later than half past 3 o'clock to-morrow. I knew there was a disposition to rush things along on the other side of the Chamber, but I will ask, since there was objection to the Senator's former request, will he not now request that we vote, say, at 4.30 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] made an announcement a moment ago that he would not agree upon any time for a vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not hear that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from New York, does he contemplate making a motion to adjourn or to take a recess?

Mr. WADSWORTH. An order was entered by unanimous consent early to-day for a recess.

Mr. NORRIS. When was that done?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Kansas made the request before luncheon, I think.

Mr. KING. The request was made about 2 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. I had spoken to several Senators who I thought would have charge of that matter, but I did not see the Senator from Kansas. I informed each one of those Senators if the request was made and I was not here that I desired to be notified and told them why. On yesterday I gave notice, as I had to do under the rules, of a motion which I intended to make to suspend the rule in order that I might offer an amendment. Under the rule such a notice must lie over for a day. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], as I understand, has given a similar notice.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska did discuss this matter with me, and I understand, of course, the difficulty in which he finds himself with respect to being able to offer to this bill the amendment which he contemplates. I am going to make a suggestion in the open Senate. The Senator from Nebraska in good faith offered an amendment on yesterday and then gave notice that he would move to suspend the rule. The rule provides that such a notice must go over one legislative day in advance of calling up a motion to suspend the rules. I ask unanimous consent that the notice given by the Senator from Nebraska—

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from New York to also include my notice in his request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And also that the notice just given by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] be deemed sufficient under the rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. In other words, so far as the notices are concerned, that the taking of a recess shall not interfere with the calendar day?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the rule refers to the calendar day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The impression has been that it meant legislative day, but I do not desire that there shall be any mistake about the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 7, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Glory be to God and Father of us all. As Thy law is so just, Thy love so bountiful, and Thy wisdom so infinite may they command our unquestioned obedience and our full measure of devotion. Thou knowest us altogether, where we are weak and where we are strong. Lead us toward Thyself that our strength may grow. O wondrously sweet and helpful is the service inspired by Thy wisdom and blest by Thy grace. Continue to establish the ideals for which our fathers gave their lives and liberties. Bless our country, and may we build our very selves into the life and character of its righteous institutions. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a statement relating to the old Revised Statutes and the laws prior thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

THE LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

BIOREN & DUANE.

An act of Congress of April 18, 1814, provided for the purchase of a thousand copies of an edition of the Laws of the United States, to be published by Bioren & Duane, of Philadelphia, and Roger Weightman, of Washington. The Secretary of State and Attorney General were directed to prescribe a plan for the books, the Secretary to appoint a competent person to look after it under his direction and that of the Attorney General. Richard Rush, Attorney General, outlined the plans for the work, which was to include every law, private and public, except with regard to the District of Columbia, as well as all treaties and the work of Congress under the Confederation, with an index but no annotations. James Monroe, Secretary of State, agreed to this and appointed John B. Colvin to edit the laws. The laws were arranged simply in chronological order, and this is a very interesting and valuable publication. This was followed by a somewhat similar series of books which had the approval of the famous Judge Story.

LITTLE & BROWN'S LAWS.

From 1845 until 1874 the firm of Little & Brown, of Boston, by contract, published the Statutes at Large of the United States, beginning with the first session of the First Congress. The work was under the charge of Charles C. Little, and Richard Peters, of Philadelphia, was their editor for several years, followed by George Minot and George F. Sanger. These publications, and this contract terminated when the Revised Statutes became the law of the land.

REVISED STATUTES OF 1874.

In the second session of the Fortieth Congress there was selected a committee of the House on revision of the laws, the Hon. Luke P. Poland, of Vermont, being chairman. This became a regular committee in the third session of the Fortieth Congress. In the Forty-first Congress George W. McCrary, George F. Hoar, Austin Blair, and Daniel W. Voorhees were members of the committee, of which Mr. Poland was chairman.

THE SENATE.

During the first, second, and third sessions of the Forty-first Congress Roscoe Conkling was chairman of the Senate Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, consisting of Roscoe Conkling, Charles Sumner, Mathew H. Carpenter, Thomas F. Bayard, and others.

In the Forty-second Congress Benjamin F. Butler was chairman of the Committee on Revision in the House and Conkling in the Senate, where George F. Edmunds and William M. Stewart had become members.

The Forty-third Congress passed the Revised Statutes of the United States. Conkling, Carpenter, Stewart, Alcorn of Mississippi, and Ransom of North Carolina were on the Senate committee, while Poland, Rockwood, Hoar, Alexander H. Stephens, and Lawrence of Ohio were among the members of the House committee.

THE COMMISSIONERS.

Under the act of June 27, 1866, a commission was appointed to revise and consolidate the statutes. They made reports in 1868 and in 1869. In 1871 Charles P. James, Benjamin Vaughan, and Victor Barringer, commissioners, made reports. In 1873 they made a full report to the committee, of which General Butler was chairman, having compiled and revised the statutes. Thomas F. Durant, a Washington lawyer, of Louisiana, was employed by the committee to revise them back again. The book was often called the Durant revision in the debates and generally. The committee met November 11 and proceeded with that work and continued it at night sessions of the House for several nights, until the bill passed the House and went to the Senate. The final chapter on the repealing provisions was passed by the House without ever having been printed at all, the written copy being presented on the last evening. The only purpose of the night sessions was to permit the Committee on Revision to present its own amendments to the Durant revision, making additions and corrections. The bill then went to the Senate. The chairman of the House committee feels that it might perhaps be of assistance to the Senate in considering this measure to place at its disposal what is thought to be a full, complete statement of everything said and done in the Senate in 1874 on legislation similar to this, and it follows below:

[FROM CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.]

CONKLING PRESENTS REVISED STATUTES.

MAY 25, 1874.

"Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Committee on the Revision of the Laws have directed me to report to the Senate three bills which I will name by their titles: First, a bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873. This bill, one of three which I am going to report, contains 1,432 printed pages. I report also the bill (H. R. No. 3349) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, relating to the District of Columbia in force on the 1st day of December, in the year of our Lord 1873, and a like act from the House (H. R. No. 2879) revising and embodying all the laws authorizing post roads in force on the 1st day of December, 1873. The three bills make an aggregation of matter which I hold up that Senators may see it.

"In reporting these bills I wish to give notice that I shall ask—I do not ask now, because of the absence of many Senators—unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bills, a thing not unknown in our parliamentary history, although no such occasion for it as this ever arose before. The Senate will see that to read these bills in extenso would take a week, perhaps a fortnight, and nobody would listen to them. They have all been put in print and furnished weeks ago to every Member of the Senate. Since that time, I should say, however, many changes have been made—made with a pen—erasing sections, amending sections, and changing throughout the numbers of sections, so that Senators, if they wish to see the very words of the act as it has come from the House of Representatives, will be compelled to resort to the Secretary's table and read for themselves from this copy, as to reprint it would be very costly and very onerous and not attended with any compensations of convenience or value. The committee, as soon as the pending deficiency bill shall be disposed of, will ask the Senate to take up these three acts; and ponderous as they are, the work for the Senate will be, I might almost say, formal, because the Senate will be compelled to rely upon the action of the three sets of commissioners who have been employed upon this work and the action of the joint committees of the two Houses during the last year, along with the amendments adopted in the House pursuant to recommendations made by their committee. The Senate will be compelled to take as they are these bills, or I fear to abandon them for this session. If we amend them here, the bills may fall in the other House, and the committee believe that they are now as nearly right as we can hope to get them by any additional process to which they can be subjected.

"Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senator from New York a question for information, as I do not know how this revision has been made. I inquire whether these commissioners of the joint committee have condensed the statutes, changing their phraseology and clothing them to any considerable extent in new language? I understand the Senator to say this morning that the whole statutes would be reduced to one volume in size, and from that I infer that there has been a condensation and necessarily a change in the phraseology of the laws.

"Mr. CONKLING. If I understand the Senator, he is right in his conjecture. The commission finding, if you please, a page of sections relating to a particular subject, have condensed the true intent and meaning of that page of sections into words as few as they could employ for that purpose. Such has been the aim and object of the work, and now the whole body of statute law is to be in a volume not as large as that which I hold up, because this print is larger in size and the margin wider than it will be when it becomes a law book. That portion of this volume [exhibiting to the Senate] will probably represent the size of the single volume into which the whole body of the statute laws has been carried, assuming the work to be perfect and effectual; and although phraseology, of course, has been changed, the aim throughout has been to preserve absolute identity of meaning, not to change the law in any particular, however minute, but to present in miniature or in condensation the law in all its parts as it was actually found to exist dispersed through 17 volumes of statutes.

"I will send these bills to the desk, saying to Senators that they will be left there, although they must not expect to see them printed and find them on their desks, in the hope that Senators will look at them; and I will say that I think it would be well for Senators to look at the last page and a half of the larger one of these acts, that page containing repealing and saving clauses, so that no rights shall be lost by any inadvertence or oversight, and at the same time repealing all statutes except those now to be found in these Revised Statutes, so as to make them complete in themselves without reference to anything else.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ferry of Michigan). The Senator from New York, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reports several bills to go on the calendar and gives notice that at the conclusion of the pending bill he will seek the floor to call up those bills.

"MAY 26, 1874.

"Mr. CONKLING. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the larger bill, a bill to consolidate the statutes of the United States, reported yesterday from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to take up the bill (H. R. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873.

"The motion was agreed to.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

"Mr. CONKLING. The Senate will remember that an invitation has been accepted to attend in the House of Representatives a funeral which occurs at 4 o'clock. Of course, therefore, no considerable progress can be made with this bill now. I shall, however, accomplish a very important object if I can obtain, as I now ask, unanimous consent to dispense with the reading in extenso of the bill, and before the Chair asks for consent I wish to suggest to one or two Senators who were not here yesterday that the proportions of the bill, which will now be seen in the hands of the Secretary, are such that to read it would occupy many days, and of course it would not be listened to. Therefore I hope that no Senator will object to waiving the reading of the bill.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this matter had better go over until the morning. I do not expect to ask that the bill be read. I think myself that would be useless; but I think we ought to reserve the right to have any portion read that Senators may desire as a matter of right. All I wish to hear read is the last chapter or two, which relate to repeals.

"Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask that by unanimous consent the reading of the bill be waived, except so far as the reading of specific parts of it may be called for by Senators.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the reading of this bill may be dispensed with, except as particular parts may be called for in the consideration of the bill before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so understood.

"Mr. CONKLING. Now, to leave this bill the unfinished business, although I beg to say to Senators that it will take but a very short time to-morrow, and therefore it will not impede, as I think, seriously anything behind it, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chairman will remind the Senator that the usual course on such an occasion has been not to adjourn, but for the Senate as a Senate to attend the funeral, and then return to the Chamber and adjourn.

"Mr. CONKLING. Then I make the motion in that form.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate now proceed to the House of Representatives to attend the funeral.

"Mr. SHERMAN. We have not been notified that they are ready to receive us.

"Mr. CONKLING. We have accepted the invitation to be there at 4 o'clock.

"MAY 27, 1874.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair). The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill (H. R. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

"Mr. CONKLING. The Chair may not be aware that by unanimous consent the reading of the bill at large was waived, any Senator, of course, being at liberty to call for the reading of any part he desires.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. The repealing chapter was excepted, to be read.

"Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Vermont calls for the reading of the seventy-fourth chapter.

"The Chief Clerk read: 'Title 74, repealed provisions.'

"The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

"CONKLING ANSWERS EDMUNDS.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, if he will not think it implies any inference on the committee, as it does not, how sure the committee is, as we necessarily take this revision entirely on trust, that it does embrace existing law and nothing new?

"Mr. CONKLING. That is not a very easy question to answer: 'How sure is the committee?' I scarcely know how to answer that. It is a question I have heard put to a witness sometimes, and always excluded when objected to, it relating to comparative degrees of assurance. Certainly I can only say, as the Senator from Vermont well knows, that this work has engaged the attention of three sets of commissioners, and the examination of the committees of the two Houses, and of the committees of the two Houses acting jointly, and of the House special sessions being set apart for many days for its consideration; and all those concerned, as far as I can judge, tried to do their duty in regard to it. But when the Senator asks me to state how sure I am or how sure they are that this immense volume, made of the gathered meaning of 17 or 18 volumes of statutes, contains no blunder, I repeat the question is difficult to answer. There is upon the second page of the bill, or preceding the second page as it stands, a list of errors called 'errata,' which are to be corrected in the reprinting; and many other errors have been found and have been corrected.

"Perhaps I should be more candid in my answer if I were to say to the Senator from Vermont that I have no expectation that this work is free from error. I have never known any revision of laws that was. We have had several revisions in the State of New York, conducted by very eminent and expert men usually, and we never had one which did not contain errors. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Boutwell] will bear me out in saying that although they revise very carefully, in spite of all their processes, errors are found. I presume errors will be found here, and as they are developed they must be corrected by future legislation.

"Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask the Senator from New York—for I have not given sufficient attention to know—whether he has been careful to preserve rights which have accrued under the law as it stood at the time the revision took effect?

"Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator will be satisfied that in that regard there is no danger from the bill. The repealing and saving clauses are very careful and very broad, preserving all accrued rights on both sides, preserving penalties where they have accrued, preserving rights and opportunities where they have accrued, and providing with, I think, very thorough carefulness of language that no person and no right shall suffer by any casus omissus or the like which may be found in this work.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course, there does not seem to be any other way to dispose of this subject than the way recommended by the committee; at any rate, no practical way at this session. It would take all the rest of the session, no doubt, to go through with it in the ordinary way as theoretically and justly I think ought to be done. And when I say that, I mean also to add that I have no doubt the committee has given it the most careful criticism and attention; and the only advantage of going over it again, having entire faith in that committee, is the advantage of having 73 men having different ideas and thoughts, and different objects and motives in their minds, hear it read and examine it and criticize it, rather than 5 or 7. Of course, there would be a great advantage in that against error and slip over an examination by a smaller number of persons. Everybody understands that. But it is impracticable, as a fact, to do that at this session of Congress; and the question therefore recurs whether we are to let it go, or whether we are to take it, as the committee asks us to do, in bulk, without reading or knowing its contents otherwise. I am disposed, for one, to take it, because, as the Senator from New York says, it undoubtedly does contain in the main a mere condensation of existing law, and does contain a very carefully prepared saving of all created and existing rights of everybody; and if there are errors, of course they can be corrected hereafter, although that is not a good way to legislate, as a rule.

"On the other hand, one can not help remembering that two chapters of this revision—I do not mean of this particular book, but of the revision—have passed Congress already. Whether they are reenacted in this book, I do not know. I presume they are. I suppose that the chapter about the Post Office Department is in this book.

"Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. And the chapter about the Patent Office?

"Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir. If you mean about the Post Office Department, that is here; but if you mean post roads, that is a separate bill.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. But the general post office act is here?

"Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. We passed under the revision idea a bill regulating Patent Office affairs and another regulating the Post Office. We passed those, although, of course, not a quarter as long as this is, without going through a careful revision in the Senate; I believe without even reading them. If they were read, it was a very formal and hurried reading indeed. It turned out that in the Patent Office act the statutes repealed by it were many of them most important to the interests of the United States and not having the slightest reference to patents except that in some section of one of them which I have in mind there was a provision that patent fees should be paid into the Treasury; and in the post office act it was afterwards discovered that there had been introduced what was not the existing law before, a provision conferring power upon the Postmaster General in reference to making contracts, which I do not think would have received the assent of a majority or even of a small number of the Senators and Representatives in Congress if they had understood its provisions.

"Of course, these are difficulties that we are obliged to meet, and this is the experience which we have had in respect to two chapters of the revision, not in this book, because I presume they are corrected in this, but I do not know. Of course, it is an unpleasant experience, and it is with a great deal of doubt as to the propriety of any Senator of the whole body of Senators not being willing to sit down patiently and have the committee go over with us the whole of this work, chapter by chapter, and consider it and discuss it as if we were a committee of the whole to whom had been committed this business, that I, taking my share of the responsibility for passing it in the end, do not insist upon that and allow the thing to go. I do not say this to lay an anchor to windward, so as to be able to say hereafter, 'I told you so,' but to say, taking my share of the responsibility as one Senator that it is a kind of legislation which I hope will be very rarely resorted to at all; but I do not see any other way, as the Senator from New York says, at this time but to take it.

"Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I can not but feel that this is a somewhat dangerous business. Conceding, as I have no doubt is the case, that the committee has devoted a great deal of labor and time to the consideration of this volume, it is, after all, substantially, and must be, the work of three commissioners. I believe that was the number appointed to codify the laws. We are told that some 15 or 16 volumes have been boiled down substantially into 1. This involves great condensation. It involves changing of phraseology, putting the statutes into new language, and shortening them as far as possible. This volume must in the nature of things, therefore, be a digest, and nothing more. We all know the difficulty the courts have, and sometimes it takes them years, to settle upon construction of a single statute; but here these commissioners are allowed to give their construction to all the statutes of the United States, and to change their language, to clothe them in new phraseology, and we take all their work upon trust. We take their construction, their views of the meaning of these laws. Where courts have long differed and will continue to differ in regard to the meaning of a single section, we are to take the views of three men, without consideration, without opportunity to review, in regard to the whole statutory code of the United States. It is a laborious business; there are great difficulties around it; but, for one, I feel that it is very unsafe business. If the language of the statutes is to be changed, it ought to be considered by Congress, and each session some part of the work should be done. We should not undertake to do it all at one session, but it should be divided out, running through a series of sessions of Congress. It is much more important to have this work done correctly than to have it done in a lump and all at once.

MATT. CARPENTER'S VIEWS.

"Mr. CARPENTER (Mr. Anthony in the chair). The Senator from Indiana says this is a dangerous thing. That is undoubtedly so. It is dangerous to pass any law, because there may be a mistake in it that will harm somebody. That danger is inherent. We can not avoid that difficulty. Every exercise of sovereign power is dangerous in that sense, that if there is an error lurking in it and if it is not discovered it may do harm.

"The Senator says this work has been done by three commissioners, and from that he derives an objection to it. I think it would have been an improvement if it could have been done by one competent man. Where you have got one thing to do, whether it be to carve a statue or paint a picture or revise the laws of Congress, if it can be done by one mind, you are more likely to have it correct than you are if it is participated in by more than one.

"Now, what does the Senator suppose would become of that revision if it were to come in here and take the fate of ordinary bills in the Senate Chamber? The youngest boy born in this country to-day never could live to see it disposed of. Suppose it were put into installments, part of it taken up one session and part another, by the time you had gone through two or three sessions your accumulated legislation would make a new revision absolutely necessary; you never could end anything, and never would come to any conclusion.

"Undoubtedly there will be found errors in this revision. There never was a revision made, as the Senator from New York has said, that did not have errors. It is not in the nature of things that the revision of so many statutes should be absolutely perfect. All that we can do is to give it every guaranty that such a work ever can have, that it is correct. The great benefit of it is that it gives us a starting point for the law, and if errors are discovered, as undoubtedly there will be more or less, they are to be corrected by subsequent legislation, and every man, every citizen, every lawyer, every judge, knows what he has got to start with to find what the law is. He is to start with that volume, and then subsequent legislation is all he has got to discover. Tell any common man in the complicated relations of official life, who is an internal revenue collector, if you please, or has something to do with the distilling business, that he is supposed to know all the law on that subject, and it is to be found in 17 volumes, and he is to be indicted if he omits a single particular or mistakes a single provision, and he would as soon go to the insane asylum at once as attempt to wade through it. Now, then, he has got a start; he has got the statute of revision; and then he has got to look to subsequent legislation and nothing else, and is certain he has all the enactments on the subject before him.

"Mr. SARGENT. I think it would be wisdom for the Senate to adopt the recommendation of the committee and pass the code as it is, for I think great care has been given to this revision. Nevertheless, on an examination of some parts of the code with which I am more familiar from my former occupations, I think I find that it is not an entire codification so much as it is the insertion of parallel passages, if I may so express myself; and I will illustrate by a single instance which I have in mind. I do not know but that I should be somewhat puzzled as a lawyer, perhaps anyone would be puzzled, to know exactly what the law would be in the instance which I call to the attention of the Senate on page 541 of the revision with reference to mining claims. Section 2354 in the original numbering reads, part of it, thus:

"But no location of a placer claim made after the 9th of July, 1870, shall exceed 160 acres for any one person or association of persons, which location shall conform to the United States surveys."

"That authorizes a person or an association of persons to take 160 acres, and that was the law for a number of years. Finally Congress thought that 160 acres of mining land was too much for one person. That might be a matter of doubt. At any rate they changed the law subsequently, as I remember by the history of the legislation as well as finding it here, and they provided that all claims located after the 10th of May, 1872, shall conform as near as practicable to the United States system of public land surveys and the rectangular subdivisions of such surveys, and no location shall include more than 20 acres for each individual claimant.

"Mr. CONKLING. Subsequent to 1872.

"Mr. SARGENT. No. The first act says subsequent to the 9th day of July, 1870, but the second one says subsequent to 1872.

"Mr. CONKLING. Does not the Senator see that there is an interval required to be covered by the first statute?

"Mr. SARGENT. Exactly; but that is not the principle of the original law. The second act which I have read was intended to repeal and did in fact absolutely repeal the former one.

"Mr. CONKLING. Then it contains something the Senator has not read.

"Mr. SARGENT. No, sir.

"Mr. CONKLING. He has read nothing that comes within eight rows of apple trees of repealing it, if the Senator will pardon me.

"Mr. SARGENT. I have been unable to find anything further on the subject. But I mean to say that the second law to which I have referred, which made this second regulation and confined the location to 20 acres, did contain a repealing clause of the former legislation, and since that time all locations have been made to each party of 20 acres. If, however, under a fair and reasonable construction of this law, it still remains at 20 acres, then my criticism would have no force.

"Mr. MORTON. It repeals the former law necessarily, without any repealing clause.

"Mr. SARGENT. But here both are reproduced. Which prevails, the first or second section of this bill? As they are passed contemporaneously, there is no question of time to assist the construction. I mention that to show that there are crudities in this revision. A person understanding that subject thoroughly, and his attention having been drawn to it, could put it in one section, so as to have no confusion. As it is now, we shall have to rely on the judgment of the executive officers in construing the law. This may be the only instance of the sort in this volume, but it is one that struck my attention more particularly.

"But, Mr. President, considering the very careful revision that has been given to this code and believing it to be the best thing we can do on the subject, I shall vote with the gentleman who reports it.

"Mr. CONKLING. If my friend from Indiana had not spoken so quickly and so positively about this one repealing the other without any repealing clause, I should have been ignorant enough to read this over a good many times without finding it out, and I should not be surprised if some other Senators, even the Senator from Indiana, should be in the same position if he will take this and look at it. Let us see:

"But no location of a placer claim made after the 9th day of July, 1870, shall exceed 160 acres for any one person or association of persons," etc.

"Then, in the next section we find:

"Where placer claims are upon surveyed lands and conform to legal subdivisions no further survey or plat shall be required, and all placer mining claims."

"Mr. SARGENT. It is the same thing.

"Mr. CONKLING. Not at all. My friend remarks that it is the same thing. I made no affirmation about it. I merely read what the bill says:

"And all placer mining claims located after the 10th of May, 1872."

"That is, located after a different day, more than two years after the first.

"Mr. SARGENT. Of course; that is what I said.

"Mr. EDMUNDS. That refers to the act of 1872, which was a general act on the subject of mining.

"Mr. MORTON. One law modified the other, of course.

"Mr. CONKLING. This is getting very interesting. The Senator from Indiana now says 'one law modified the other.' Of course it does; but what he said first was that one law repeals the other.

"Mr. MORTON. It does to the extent that it modified it.

"Mr. CONKLING. Even though there was no repealing clause, he said one repealed the other. He does not mean that. He does not mean that when one statute says, even if it relates to precisely the same thing—whether it does or not, I do not stop to consider, although apparently it does not—he does not mean, when a statute relating to one thing requires that after a certain day in 1870 certain claims and rights shall exist, and another statute provides that after a day two years, later than that all those rights shall be governed differently, one statute repeals the other. He means that it modifies, as he last says, the other, taking effect upon what shall be in the future the effect of the latter statute. A statute of a State which did that would probably be void by the Constitution of the United States; a statute of the United States which did it might be supposed to be void under another provision of the Constitution for taking away property without compensation. Therefore, the man who after 1870 took 160 acres under that statute had just as good a title to it forever as the man who after 1872 took 20 acres under the subsequent statute, and they would not repeat each other. I submit, at all.

"Mr. MORTON. I do not suppose anybody can have misunderstood what the Senator from California said about it, or my remark. The second statute was intended to change the first statute and reduce the number of acres in the way of a placer claim that anyone could take. The Senator from California called attention to the fact that both of these statutes are placed there together. A dispute has already arisen. The Senator from New York is on hand, of course, to make it all clear, but he will not always be on hand to make these things clear when these difficulties arise. That is a single instance of confusion already arising upon this code, and perhaps is an illustration of the danger of taking a codification made by three men involving a change of phraseology of all the statutes of the United States that have been carefully considered at different sessions of Congress for some 60 or 70 years. As I said before, I think it is a very dangerous business; and if we wanted an illustration of it we find it in the little colloquy that has just taken place.

"Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from New York whether the reduction in the tariff made two years ago, of 10 per cent on certain articles therein specified, is taken off each article in this codification, or whether provision is made by which that reduction shall be made as it was in the act? I have not been able to find it.

"Mr. CONKLING. It is made by being incorporated in the chapter, so to call it, which relates to the collection laws.

"Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. I was not able to turn to it. I supposed that was the way it would be. I saw it was not on each specific article.

"The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed."

So we thus present the debate under which the Revised Statutes became the law of the land and the greatest law book in the world 47 years ago. It was suggested that in so big a book there would be mistakes, and of course there were. The question was whether they should make the mistake of continuing to be without a code, or continuing to have their laws scattered through many volumes, practically inaccessible, and, what was more important, of having laws thus scattered made at random without any knowledge at the moment of just what they repealed by implication. In our Federal legislation there is comparatively very little direct repeal. The committees have no time to run down everything with which their legislation might be inconsistent and conflicting, and it thus becomes the duty of the courts to interpret the laws and decide what legislation repealed something prior. The theory of this codification has been that it did not favor repeals by implication; that the law made by Congress should be restated, unless it was entirely evident that Congress intended a repeal. In such cases, when there seems to be conflict between sections of the law, it is for the courts to decide what is the law. The Committee on Revision of the Laws has not endeavored to make judicial decisions on such points, but rather to put in the law made and let the courts decide, as they would be compelled to if there be no code.

In many departments, bureaus, and elsewhere the administrative and executive offices have been compelled, perhaps, to reach conclusions on such questions. For that reason customs and practices have grown up in various places in the Government which have had the force of law, but which are not the law at all, because the interpretation was sometimes made by men without any serious legal equipment or experience, yet to them and their successors these erroneous interpretations of the statutes have become sacred and they have been very much surprised that they have been violating the law for years.

Before the Revised Statutes were completely printed in 1874, the committee discovered 67 errors and corrected them by a bill immediately presented and enacted, which was placed in the same book with the Revised Statutes as an appendix. The committee has thought best to comb this bill right now and present those points as suggestions for amendment in the Senate.

This bill is three times as big as the other, and there are probably some mistakes in it. The West Publishing House recently wrote the chairman that they proof read their publications of the statutes three times, but that if they proof read them forty times, there would still without doubt be mistakes in them. There are very many mistakes in the Statutes at Large that never have been corrected, as the committee has discovered. If the proposed code is enacted it will be a comparatively easy task to search its pages and to correct any mistakes that may be subsequently discovered. If thereupon future legislation is based upon a code and repeals are definitely and accurately made, Congress can go a long way toward avoiding many of the problems which are forced upon the courts as to just what legislation means when it seems to conflict with prior legislation. Faithful adherence to the laws enacted of course devolves upon the proposed code the apparent conflicts which various individuals have without authority settled to their own satisfaction. A law clerk down in a bureau looks at two or three statutes and repeals all of them he doesn't like, with as much graceful abandon as Richard cried, "Off with his head; so much for Buckingham." Then he is profoundly surprised when the Committee on Revision, whose members have enjoyed a practice at the bar which, when combined, reaches an experience of 250 years, decline to take the responsibility of repealing laws which Congress has never repealed. The committee prefers to leave those problems with the courts just as Congress did, presenting in the saving clauses of its last title everything that can possibly be said to preserve all rights, perpetuate all laws, and make clear the purpose of the laws. For 18 months the chairman of the committee, with a corps of able lawyers assisting, and under the supervision of the committee of learned lawyers, has assembled the general and permanent laws of the land and presented them in one great code. Expeditiously as it has been done, it only comes down to the beginning of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and if it be postponed, the next time if attempted it will be still further behind, and it should begin as near down to date as possible in order to be practically useful. The Revised Statutes of 1874 were very soon followed by a second edition which corrected all the errors practically of its predecessor and was able then to bring the Revised Statutes down to the date of their publication practically. It is quite possible that the same plan may be adopted if this bill becomes a law, and without doubt starting, as Senator Carpenter says, from the foundation of this collection of the laws, the next one can in many ways surpass the first edition.

The Codes of Justinian and Napoleon of course contained many mistakes, too, but those mighty law books formed the standard for a century of legislation in one case and for 13 centuries in the other, and have been absolutely invaluable to generations of litigants, courts, barristers, and nations. Mistakes in this code can easily be corrected, but to begin at the beginning and make another is a task that probably no one would care to undertake unless men are very differently constituted than they have been since 1874. Every year the laws accumulate without a code throws still more confusion into the interpretation of the statutes, and the committee which has so laboriously achieved this compilation and codification earnestly hope that the views of Conkling, Carpenter, Bayard, Edmunds, Beck, Butler, Poland, Lawrence, Sargent, Morrill, and Alexander H. Stephens may be considered worthy of consideration and approval now, when there is so much more confusion and necessity for such an assembly and determination of the laws. Every man has a right to know what the laws are, and half a hundred Federal judges and attorneys have told us that no man can know certainly what the laws are now after 47 years of continued legislation unchecked. The opportunity is here presented that was given then, and that great book of 1874 has never been seriously challenged upon any point of importance, and for nearly half a century has been the north star of all American litigation and legislation, as it is hoped by many this will be, if adopted.

TRAFFIC CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I noticed in one of the newspapers of the city last evening an article stating that there were 298 more arrests for speeding made in this city in the last month than in the month before. On a report from the superintendent of police it is stated that arrests for traffic law violations in this city in the month of January totaled 2,326 and that of these 924 were for speeding, an increase of 298 over the previous month.

In my judgment it is time that Congress and the public should take some notice of traffic conditions in the city of Washington. They have become almost unbearable. The number of arrests stated by the superintendent of police might indicate that something was being done to prevent the constant daily and hourly violations of the speed regulations, but these arrests amount to nothing. There is nothing stated in this article as to how many were fined or sent to jail, but it is my understanding that few were fined and fewer punished by imprisonment; mere arrest and deposit of collateral, which is generally forfeited, amounts to nothing.

The usual practice is to take a small deposit, and the person who violates the law never appears in the police court at all. His deposit is forfeited, and that is all there is of it, and he goes on his way and commits the same kind of violations again. This practice is wholly ineffective so far as correcting conditions, which are constantly getting worse and which are a disgrace to the city.

Punishment should be of such degree as to deter not only the one punished but all others as well. Let it be known once for all that violation of the speed regulations will meet with certain punishment of a degree commensurate with the offense, and that is not by forfeiture of collateral, not by fine only, but by fine and imprisonment in every case, and operators of motor cars will soon learn that it is wise to obey the law. Where the death of an innocent pedestrian is caused by reason of the unlawful speed of a motor car the person so causing the death should be held to the grand jury and punished for the felony, for such it is. It is high time that the people of this city should awake to the fact that the city is getting the reputation of being an unsafe place for anyone to be upon its streets, that life is unsafe on the streets of the Capital City of the Nation, and unless conditions are remedied people will hesitate to visit the city.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Is it not a fact that a chauffeur, obtaining his license in the District of Columbia, after once obtaining it never has to go before the commissioners again to show whether he is qualified?

Mr. FULLER. I understand that to be the case; that almost all that is necessary in order to get a permit to drive an automobile is to make the application and pay the fee, and then it continues year after year without any renewal.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not most of the trouble due to the fact that irresponsible chauffeurs employed on salaries, who do not own their cars, are permitted to drive, and they do not care whether they have accidents or not as long as they keep their own bodies whole?

Mr. FULLER. Undoubtedly that is frequently the case. One reason that has induced me to make these remarks this morning is that a few days ago the matter was brought home to me in such a way as not to be ignored. A member of my own family, the sister of my wife, visiting in Washington for a few days, had an errand on the street only a block away. Fifteen minutes after she left the home where she was staying her crushed and mangled body was in the hospital, murdered by a reckless and irresponsible automobile driver, who never ought to have been granted a permit to operate an automobile. And I say now that it is just as dangerous to give a permit to operate an automobile to a reckless, incompetent, and irresponsible person as it would be to give him a permit to carry a loaded revolver, because one is a dangerous weapon as much as the other; and more lives are endangered, more deaths result from violations of traffic regulations, from improper use of automobiles, and particularly from speeding, than from all other deadly weapons in existence, for the automobile is a deadly weapon when in improper hands, and permits should be granted only to proper persons, after the most rigid examination as to character and fitness to be intrusted with such a weapon; and in case of improper use, of negligence, or of demonstrated unfitness such permit should in every case be promptly revoked.

I have been told frequently that traffic conditions in this city are worse than in any other city in the United States. I do not know whether that is so or not, but I do know that in the past year I have had to jump for my life at least a thousand times to get away from speeding automobiles. What I would like now is to have these facts made public so that some remedy may be found to correct these conditions. I know something about the speed at which automobiles go. I have watched the speedometers on machines and I know when they are going beyond the proper limit. No automobile upon the streets of a city should be permitted to run more than 15 miles an hour. A greater speed than that on city streets is always dangerous. Automobiles in this city are operated every day upon the public streets at a rate of speed as great as that of the average railroad train upon a track, and anyone knows that that is dangerous to human life. In my judgment three things should be done: First, permits should be granted only upon a rigid examination, and only to proper persons and under proper conditions, and no such permit should be extended beyond one year. Second, the practice of taking a deposit from a person who violates the speed regulations and allowing him simply to forfeit that deposit should be abolished. A man who violates the law and is arrested for that violation should be compelled to appear and stand trial, and let it be a public matter; and let him not only be fined, but if it is a willful violation let there be a jail sentence, and when life is taken by a man who is violating the speed law, the law presumes him to be responsible for the necessary consequences of his act and he ought to be indicted and punished for manslaughter or murder, because that is what it is. [Applause.]

I have also another clipping from a paper last night as to conditions in the city of Detroit.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Have there been any cases where offenders have been given jail sentences for these violations of the traffic laws of the District of Columbia?

Mr. FULLER. I understand that only a very small number were given jail sentences. The rest were given either small fines or, in the great majority of cases, they simply forfeited their collateral and never appeared in court at all. Such a pretended enforcement of the law is a farce.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman realize that we will never have safety on the streets until the court begins to punish those who violate the law?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea that when a driver is willfully convicted of violation of the traffic laws he should be deprived of his permit?

Mr. FULLER. He should be deprived of his permit. That should be one of the punishments. Another punishment that should be inflicted is that the man who violates the traffic regulations more than once, or becomes a chronic violator of the traffic laws, should forfeit his automobile as well as the right to drive?

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Does the gentleman realize that Washington is the poorest lighted city of its size in the country, and that owing to the frequent circles pedestrians have to be in the fairway for such a great distance in crossing the street that it increases the danger, and that 80 per cent of the accidents are on account of the negligence of pedestrians?

Mr. FULLER. I do not think that is true at all. We had a safety week in Washington a few weeks ago and notices were posted all around reading "Don't get hurt." They were all against the pedestrians. I did not notice any except the cartoon of Berryman in the Star in which it said, "Don't hurt." Talk about pedestrians being at fault, every person that goes out on the streets of this city knows that he must be speedy and jump for his life, because there are only two classes of people in the streets—the quick and the dead. [Laughter.] If a person is not quick, he is very sure to be dead.

Personal safety induces every pedestrian to look out for himself. He knows that he must do so. When an automobile is coming at 30, 40, or 50 miles an hour, as they do sometimes in this city, a person has to look and act quickly. You see one coming 80 rods away and think there is plenty of time to cross the street, but before you know it the automobile is on you, or you escape by an inch, and such very narrow escapes are of daily and hourly occurrence—

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that my colleague, Mr. ZIEHLMAN, from Maryland, has a bill that covers every point the gentleman has made?

Mr. FULLER. I do not think so. In my judgment the bill mentioned would not help matters in the least. There is law enough now.

Mr. BLANTON. If the District of Columbia Committee can have a day in court we can give the gentleman a law that would protect pedestrians.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield? All the balance of the world is constantly shifting the responsibility to Congress, but I do not think a Member of this body ought to join in that course. There is plenty of law on the statute books now.

Mr. FULLER. That is true; there is plenty of law. The law is sufficient if enforced by the courts. They should send these violators to jail, as they do in Detroit. There they have almost eliminated accidents by the courts sending speeders to jail and the workhouse. I have an article here which states that millionaires as well as poor people have recently been sent to the workhouse for violation of the speed laws, and have been compelled to serve out their sentences.

Mr. BLANTON. But the judge here yesterday sent a man to jail for 60 days for speeding.

Mr. FULLER. Many more should have been sent.

Mr. STAFFORD. The case which the gentleman alludes to in Detroit was because Judge Bartlett has the guts to punish, and what we need here are judges to punish.

Mr. FULLER. Yes. What we need here are judges who are hard boiled and who will enforce the law and punish these violations. The law ought to be enforced, and those who violate the law concerning the operation of motor vehicles should be punished, as the law contemplates. Since the 1st of January last 10 persons have been killed in this city by speeding automobiles. In some cases it was nothing less than murder, and in such cases there is no suitable punishment but death or imprisonment in the penitentiary. If in every case of willful violation of the law the offender was punished by imprisonment there would not be many more unlawful killings, too often referred to as unavoidable accidents. There is no such thing as an unavoidable accident when it is caused by the unlawful act of the responsible person. If the driver of an automobile or any motor vehicle keeps it under control and does not go faster than the law provides, no one will be killed. Why, every street car in the city slows down at the crossing of an intersecting street, and if there is any indication of danger the car is stopped. The motorman must do this or he loses his job. But the driver of an automobile in almost every instance does not slow down at the crossing of an intersecting street, but keeps on at full speed. He does the same in going around corners; at least, this is the almost universal practice, as I have observed on many occasions. Why should not the driver of a motor vehicle be as careful as the driver of a street car? I think he should be compelled to observe the same degree of caution as the motorman on a street car; and if he would do so there would be fewer of the so-called unavoidable accidents.

Now, I wish to say just this: As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] remarked, the fault is not with Congress—there is law enough. All that is needed is to enforce the law, and that is up to the officials of this city.

I wish to quote from the article to which I have referred concerning the situation in Detroit, which was published in a newspaper of this city last evening, and which is as follows:

JAIL TERM PROVES CURB FOR SPEEDING—DETROIT'S "HARD-BOILED" COURT PUTS EFFECTIVE BAN ON JOY RIDERS.

When 240 persons were killed in 1920 by speed maniacs and careless motorists Detroit got "hard-boiled."

The result was a decrease of 40 per cent in the number of traffic fatalities in 1921—a total of at least 106 lives saved. And this sharp cut in traffic deaths was accomplished despite the fact that the number of automobiles in Detroit increased 25 per cent.

"How does Detroit do it?"

Louis Resnick, writing in the National Safety News, answers that question in two words—"cooperation" and "courage." Cooperation between the police department, the automobile club, the board of education, and the Detroit Safety Council. Courage on the part of Judge C. L. Bartlett, who presides over the Michigan city's traffic court, in sending careless motorists to jail and revoking their licenses in the bargain.

"I sat in the traffic court and watched Judge Bartlett dispense justice to speeders and other violators of traffic laws," wrote Mr. Resnick. "In one day he sentenced 29 speeders to manual labor in the house of correction. Among them were five men reputed to be millionaires, and every one of the 29 served his sentence. Almost without exception every speeder that has appeared before Judge Bartlett has received a fine ranging between $25 and $500 and has been sentenced to from 1 to 10 days in the house of correction."

"Then, to make the lesson complete, Judge Bartlett has in nearly all of these cases revoked the prisoners' automobile licenses for from three months to a year. That is courage."

A "hard-boiled" traffic court has been found to be not only a severe lesson to the man who is arrested but it is also the finest educational agency for the man who might be tempted to "step on it" now and then. He always has that vision of the rock pile or laundry tub for 10 days or a month before him, and loss of the privilege to drive after he gets out. While statistics show that the court only comes into personal contact with 1 per cent of the motorists of Detroit, its effects are felt by the other 99 by imposing sentences that really hurt on the 1 per cent.

JUDGE BARTLETT'S POLICY.

Here is Judge Bartlett's personal description of his policy:
"My policy is and shall continue to be to give the speeder the maximum penalty allowed by law. During my first few weeks on this bench I followed the old system of assessing small fines and I noticed a good many repeaters appearing before me. I then stationed persons here and there about the court room and at the outer door to listen to the comments of speeders who had been fined.

"I found that no system of fines could be effective. And so I determined on the imposition of jail sentences. Since I have adopted this policy the number of speeders brought before me had been reduced from an average of 300 a week to 7 or 8. What we need throughout America is a more severe enforcement of existing traffic laws and greater publicity of such action by the courts. I might send 100 speeders to jail in one day and if the newspapers did not print the fact the lesson would be lost to all but the 100.

"When the daily press and the moving pictures report this event, the lesson goes home to thousands of potential violators who are restrained from recklessness and carelessness by the mental vision of a spell on the rock pile."

Detroit invests $50,000 a year in the maintenance of an accident investigation bureau in its police department. "Invests" is the correct word, any citizen of Detroit will tell you, because it pays dividends in lives and limbs saved.

The bureau is comprised of 18 policemen. Their duty is to see that every accident resulting in a death or physical injury to any person is promptly and thoroughly investigated and the facts placed in the hands of the prosecuting attorney.

The minute that news of an accident is flashed to police headquarters—and it is the duty of every policeman to do that immediately—several members of the accident investigation squad rush to the scene. There they obtain statements from witnesses, distances are accurately measured, and a police photographer takes pictures of the wreck and the scene. As a result the police come into court with a case that is almost indisputable.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I move that the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] wherein he used the word "guts" be expunged from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho moves that the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They are disgraceful and should not have been uttered on this floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho. I think my colleague from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] has acted rather hastily. If he will examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he will find that very expression which the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] used at least in a dozen places.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That may be, but it has no proper place there.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, that is a favorite expression of my colleague from Arkansas, Mr. WINGO. [Laughter.] The gentleman's side of the House has placed it in the RECORD several times. I am sure that if the gentleman from Idaho had waited for a few minutes until the reporter's notes were handed to my friend from Wisconsin, he would find probably that the word had been deleted by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether the gentleman from Texas has any authority to make that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. But, if the gentleman from Wisconsin did not do it, I want to say that I am behind him anyway, because the gentleman from Wisconsin does not speak on this floor ill-advisedly. He is prepared on every subject that comes up, and he is one of the few men who is prepared on all measures that come on this floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the subject of the debate.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not in favor of striking the language of the gentleman from Wisconsin out of the RECORD. There is surely some latitude in debate here. A Member does not have to get up here on the floor and imagine that he is out under timid, shrinking Idaho skies every time he opens his mouth. He is on the floor of the United States House of Representatives where he is supposed to speak his mind even if he has to use a good old-fashioned expression once in a while. I want to say that it is a good expression that my friend from Wisconsin used, and I wish that more of us on this floor had more of just what he mentioned.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I rise to discuss the motion to strike out the language.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Wisconsin has moved the previous question. That is a privileged motion. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho that the language used by the gentleman from Wisconsin be stricken from the RECORD.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 12473. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Winco Block Coal Co., a corporation, to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River, in Mingo County, W. Va.

H. R. 11731. An act to provide for the renting of the first floor of the customhouse at Mobile, Ala., to the Mobile Chamber of Commerce.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1549).

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER AT LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4439, to revive and to reenact an act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta," approved October 6, 1917, a similar House bill being on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas calls up from the Speaker's desk a Senate bill, a similar House bill being on the calendar before the Senate bill was returned to the House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved October 6, 1917, granting the consent of Congress for the county of Pulaski, in the State of Arkansas, its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at the city of Little Rock on the site now occupied by the free highway bridge constructed by said county in the years 1896 and 1897 be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge hereby authorized be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval thereof.

Sec. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

REORGANIZATION OF FOREIGN SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 501 (Rept. No. 1546).

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 13880, a bill for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes. General debate shall be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half to those opposed. At the conclusion of the debate the bill shall be read for amendment, after which it shall be reported to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the bill sought to be made in order under this resolution has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It makes certain consolidations and changes in the Consular and Diplomatic Service. The rule provides for two hours of general debate upon the bill, one-half the time to be controlled by those favoring the bill and one-half by those opposing it. The resolution has the support of the entire membership of the Committee on Rules, I think. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire any time on the rule?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13880) for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a moment?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The rule provides for two hours of debate. I understand it to be agreeable all around that that time shall be controlled, one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], and one-half by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. PORTER. That is the understanding.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will not the gentleman kindly make that request?

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that one-half the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13880.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13880, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13880, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13880) for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. According to the rule and unanimous-consent agreement the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania to control one hour in favor of the bill.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, every man thinks that a measure to which he has given a great part of his time for some years is an important measure. I do not wish to presume in making this statement, but I think it is perfectly fair and perfectly conservative to say that the adoption of some such legislation as is here proposed will very materially improve the efficiency and the businesslike organization of the foreign service of the United States. I do not ask you, of course, to accept that upon the authority of the sponsor of the bill. I should like to call your attention to some of those who, after having given it a great deal of study, are recommending this measure. The former Secretary of State, Mr. Robert Lansing, is very strongly in favor of the bill. We have the explicit and vigorous approval and indorsement of the measure from the present Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes. If members of the committee are in doubt as to the attitude which they should take upon this bill, I should like to call their attention to certain extracts from the testimony of Secretary Hughes which are reprinted in the report, beginning on page 10 and concluding on page 14. Then we have the testimony of men who are veterans in the foreign service and who are looking at the question from a technical viewpoint—men whom the House trusts, and whom I think the House has reason to trust. I refer, for example, to the present Undersecretary of State, Mr. William Phillips, to Mr. Wilbur J. Carr, director of the Consular Service, who is perhaps as well known to the membership of this House as is any man in the Government, and who never fails to convince us both of his ability and sincerity, as well as the value of his long experience. I refer to Consul General Skinner, one of the best men in the service of the United States. Former Ambassador Henry White indorses this bill. John W. Davis, formerly an honored Member of this House and more recently ambassador to Great Britain, made a special journey from New York so that he might state to the Committee on Foreign Affairs his belief in the measure and his reasons why he believed some such program is essential to our foreign service. I refer also to Mr. Frank L. Polk, former Undersecretary of State, who also came on from New York to testify, and who made a very earnest appeal for legislation of this kind. I should like to call to the attention of the committee the fact that practically every chamber of commerce and trade organization in the United States and many of the American chambers and trade organizations functioning in other parts of the world have gone on record as favoring this particular reorganization of our foreign service. Almost all the business organizations which have foreign trade contacts are also on record to the same effect.

While I do not wish to seem to single out the views of any one Member of the House, I think it may interest my colleagues to know that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN] has made a very careful study of this bill both with respect to its substantive provisions and with respect to the outlay which will become necessary under it. Mr. MADDEN authorized me this morning to say that he is heartily in favor of the bill, and hopes a little later, after his committee duties are concluded, to speak in its favor.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Who wrote the bill?

Mr. ROGERS. The bill, like most reorganization bills, is an evolution. I think, perhaps, I wrote more of it than anybody else, but I have for weeks had the very valuable assistance of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and of representatives of the State Department whom we called before us and who helped us materially.

Mr. BLANTON. The question I desired to ask the gentleman is this. There was no explanation given Members of the House on the rule which was very limited.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill has not been read; we let it go by without a first reading. There has been no statement made as to what changes in the present law the bill makes. As one Member of the House, I think I would like to know the changes—

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will perhaps not be surprised to hear that I had intended to discuss the bill. It is for that purpose I have taken the floor.

The present foreign service of the United States is not a single foreign service. It is a dual service with the two sides of the system just as distinct as if they were in separate watertight compartments. On one side we find the Diplomatic Service of the United States; on the other side, separated from the Diplomatic Service by battlements and a moat, we find the Consular Service. A little later I shall show more in detail why I think the separation is unfortunate. At this point I would suggest simply one good reason. In the old days—and this separation is a relic of the early times of the Republic—in the old days the problems coming before our Diplomatic Service or our Consular Service were rather simple, narrow, specific things. Our world trade and our world politics seldom touched each other.

Nowadays every international question has both its diplomatic aspect and its business aspect. There is no question that comes before either side of our foreign service to-day which is not both commercial and political. And yet we have the diplomatic side of the service, the political side, completely distinct in every way from the business side of the service. That segregation arises, as I say, from historical reasons. But as the years have passed, and especially as the postwar period has more and more brought us into direct contact with world business problems, the vice of the present arrangement becomes increasingly apparent.

Let us try to visualize what these two isolated services involve. I am going to suggest that we picture the present Diplomatic Service as a tall pole, like a flagpole, sticking high up in the air, and the Consular Service a similar pole sticking up in the air a short distance away. There are no less than 25 salary and class graduations in the consular side of the service. There are six classes of consuls general; there are nine classes of consuls; there are three or four classes of consular assistants; there are three or four classes of vice consuls of career, and various others. Such a number of subdivisions for the Consular Service is manifestly unnecessary if not absurd. There are many anomalies in the arrangement of these classes which have developed from historical causes. For instance, some consuls general get higher salaries than some ministers, although they are theoretically, at least, of lower rank than ministers. For example, also, some consuls general get less salary than consuls, although naturally the title of consul general is of superior rank and authority. But aside from that there is no possible reason in theory or practice why we should have 25 classes of consuls general and consuls.

On the other side we have the diplomatic flagpole with only 4 subdivisions, as against 25. Four is too few, just as 25 is too many. But that also has arisen because of certain conditions of the past.

Here is the situation with respect to salaries: The salary range on the consular side is from $1,500 at the bottom to $12,000 at the top, but the salary range on the diplomatic side is from $2,500 at the bottom to only $4,000 at the top. A man enters the Diplomatic Service at the age of 25 or 30; he gives the 20 years which are the best years of his life to his work; he succeeds above the average of his fellows, and then he finds himself at the end of that 20 or 25 years elevated to class 1. He gets a salary of $4,000. His colleague on the consular side, serving for the same period, performing no more important duties and with no greater ability, may hope to rise to a salary of $12,000.

We suggest that both of these situations are anomalous and absolutely detrimental to the well-being of the service. So we take our two poles, put some rungs between them, and thus make them a ladder. We put in nine rungs to constitute the ladder, and we call the resultant apparatus "the foreign service of the United States." Each of these rungs represents a class. Each represents a merit promotion from the bottom class, which is class 9, up to the top class, which is class 1. Every efficient man, secretary or consul, now in the service is given an appropriate rung on the foreign service ladder. Every new man admitted hereafter starts at the bottom rung.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield.

Mr. HUSTED. I am very much interested in the bill. I think it is a perfectly splendid piece of legislation. But I wonder why the gentleman in section 4 carries the distinction which he calls anomalous. Section 4 provides that these foreign officers may be appointed as secretaries, or consular officers, or both. Why not have them simply appointed as foreign service officers and assigned to such work in the department as is best for it?

Mr. ROGERS. Because, as Secretary of State Hughes pointed out in his testimony, we can not, by writing a piece of domestic legislation, overcome world conditions and practice and nomenclature. Great Britain is not going to know our representative in London as a foreign-service officer. Our representative there must function as a secretary, or as a consul or consul general, as the case may be. All we can do is to erect this foreign-service superstructure for the purpose of making interchangeable the two sides of the service and for the purpose of establishing a uniform salary scale which will permit that interchangeability.

Mr. HUSTED. I must say that I can not quite see the force of the objection. It does not apply to ministers. It applies only to consuls and secretaries, and when accredited to any particular nation they would be assigned to certain duties, consular, or diplomatic, or clerical duties. Their status could easily be ascertained.

Mr. ROGERS. But a consular officer is a principal officer of the United States abroad. All our statutes and all the statutes and usages of every other country deal with these representatives as secretaries or as consuls. We have examined carefully the very point the gentleman makes. The views of every man with whom I have talked and the view of the committee, I think, was that while it would be desirable to get rid of the designations as secretaries and consuls, it would accomplish nothing so far as our fundamental purpose in this bill was concerned and might lead to very serious embarrassment as these officers tried to function in the cities of the world to which they went. The "foreign-service officer" designation must, I think, be a domestic matter, and it could scarcely pass current abroad.

Mr. HUSTED. I think it would not affect the fundamental purpose of the bill at all. I do not believe it would lead to any serious embarrassment. It would make them more harmonious simply to have them assigned as foreign-service representatives, and then they could be assigned to particular duties.

Mr. ROGERS. It can, in my opinion, do no harm to retain the old designations, and may easily do affirmative good.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will this bill frame our general foreign-service structure along practically the same lines as the foreign service of other countries?

Mr. ROGERS. Most of the other principal powers of the world have been tending more and more toward this interchangeable idea. Our principal trade rivals have almost complete interchangeability. We are the only principal power in the world, I think, that apparently thinks it is conclusive that a man who once starts as a consul shall, whatever his fitness, never become a diplomatic officer and vice versa. Only one consular officer in a quarter of a century has been made a minister.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, many foreign countries now are bringing men of commercial experience and prominence into their foreign service.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes. That is precisely what we hope will result from this bill. We hope it is going to bring business methods and business men into the foreign service. We think it will tremendously broaden the range of selection of men who will desire to enter the foreign service. The wider the field of selection the better should be, and I believe will be, our personnel and our representation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If I understand the tendency in other countries, particularly the large commercial countries, it is toward a removal from the old bureaucratic system.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; and to permit flexibility where flexibility is likely to help the service and the country involved.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. One other question: Does this bill relate to the work that is being done by the Department of Commerce in foreign lands?

Mr. ROGERS. It has no bearing whatever upon the agencies of the Department of Commerce. The House of Representatives and the Congress have very recently and by a decisive vote indicated that they wished to retain the foreign activities of the Department of Commerce. I think the Committee on Foreign Affairs would feel that it had no right to go against what seems to be an apparent mandate of the House in that regard.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As I recall, the Secretary of State said he believed this bill had the cordial approval of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. ROGERS. He specifically stated that in the hearing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May I make one other observation in connection with what I have said? For my part, personally, I think it would be advisable if we could coordinate the work of the Department of Commerce and that of the foreign service.

Mr. ROGERS. I have long shared the gentleman's feeling about that.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. I notice in section 3 a very succinct statement of the proposition:

That the official designation "foreign service officer" as employed throughout this act shall be deemed to denote permanent officers in the foreign service below the grade of minister, all of whom are subject to promotion on merit, and who may be assigned to duty in either the diplomatic or the consular branch of the foreign service at the discretion of the President.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I call the attention of the gentleman to section 5, which states that—hereafter appointments to the position of foreign service officer shall be made after examination or, after five years of continuous service therein, by transfer from the Department of State under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

There is an extension, then, is there not, of the examination system, not only to the Consular Service as it already exists but also to the Diplomatic Service—to the undersecretaries, and so forth?

Mr. ROGERS. Since 1915 the Diplomatic Service has been filled as a result of examination also, excluding, of course, ambassadors and ministers.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, certainly. Does it include all other officers in the Diplomatic Service?

Mr. ROGERS. All officers in the Diplomatic Service below the rank of minister are now selected by examination, and have been for some years.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Section 5 provides that hereafter they shall all be examined for appointment to the foreign service.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; below the rank of minister.

Mr. DOWELL. Does that mean that those now in the Diplomatic Service, before appointment to the new foreign service, would be required to take an examination under this clause?

Mr. ROGERS. Section 7, line 14, specifically exempts those now in the service from further examination before reappointment in the foreign service.

Mr. DOWELL. Just one other question. Who makes the classification that is provided for, and on what basis is the classification made?

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman mean the creation of the classes in the bill or the appointments to the classes under the bill?

Mr. DOWELL. I mean the appointments under the bill. I understand that there are now different classifications under this bill?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I assume from the language that some one must place certain positions in certain classes. Who makes the classification under section 2?

Mr. ROGERS. I think if the gentleman will turn to section 7 he will find his question answered.

Mr. DOWELL. On what basis are they classified?

Mr. ROGERS. On the basis of efficiency, and also on the basis of the rank which they now hold, assuming they are found efficient.

Mr. DOWELL. Serving in different countries or different places, is there any difference in the classification in the various countries—for instance, in the Consular Service, in one country or in another?

Mr. ROGERS. In recent years there has been no classification of the Consular Service by posts. A man moves upward from class to class, first vice consul at the bottom, then consul halfway up, and then consul general. So the answer to the gentleman's question is no.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there the same classification and the same pay for the same position at one point as at another point?

Mr. ROGERS. There is no geographical element involved in the classifying.

Mr. DOWELL. But there is the rank, so far as the pay is concerned, and I assume that is with reference to the importance of the position.

Mr. ROGERS. Precisely.

Mr. DOWELL. And that is determined and the appointment is made and the classification made according to the importance of the place where they are serving?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes. Not merely, of course, the importance of the city as such, but its importance as a point of trade contact or political contact with the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. Is that based on trade questions as to classification?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; so far as the consuls are concerned, it is governed almost exclusively by that consideration. That is naturally true, because only a few consulates have any political functions, those few being at places like Ottawa and Cape Town, and the like, where consuls general represent the United States at capitals of self-governing possessions of the British Empire or some other power.

Mr. DOWELL. The qualifications and pay are all based upon these considerations?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. In the matter of promotion, does the bill provide that it shall be by blind seniority, so that a man starts in at the bottom, regardless of achievement, and goes along until he reaches the highest point, while another man, far superior in qualifications and performances, must be delayed? In other words, do they all go along together, without any chance of promotion for ability or for special merit of any kind?

Mr. ROGERS. There is no requirement in the present law, and no absolute requirement in this proposal, that promotion shall be either by selection or by seniority. So far as there is a requirement in this bill, the gentleman will find it in section 6, which provides:

That the Secretary of State is directed to report from time to time to the President, along with his recommendations, the names of those foreign-service officers who by reason of efficient service have demonstrated special capacity for promotion to the grade of minister, and the names of those foreign-service officers and officers and employees in the Department of State who by reason of efficient service, an accurate record of which shall be kept in the Department of State, have demonstrated special efficiency, and also the names of persons found upon taking the prescribed examination to have fitness for appointment to the lower grades of the service.

Our practice in the past has always been to move up men because they deserved to be moved up and not merely because they were older or had longer experience in the service. Every requirement of efficient service—of course, assuming proper administration—necessitates selection promotion instead of seniority promotion.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman realizes that there is always danger when it comes to make a selection by merit or examination, and unless there is some means of selection, and blind seniority is followed, it means danger and death.

Mr. ROGERS. That is an age-old controversy in the Army and the Navy. I agree with the gentleman that as far as foreign service is concerned the selective basis is the lesser of the two evils.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not only in the Army and the Navy but in the House of Representatives. [Laughter.] The gentleman has alluded to the nine-rung ladder. Is that ladder social or political? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. It is one of true merit—an American ladder.

Mr. BLANTON. But the foreign agent who is on the ninth rung of the ladder would be nine places removed on social occasions from the one who occupied the first rung.

Mr. ROGERS. Not at all.

Since the gentleman has brought up the social question I will discuss it for a moment.

As between the present two services, the Diplomatic Service is primarily the social agency of the Government. In my judgment, the caste that has occasionally become manifest in the Diplomatic Service has been most unfortunate and un-American. If this bill passes, a young man upon entering the foreign service will, I hope, first be sent to a consulate. He will learn a lot of things at that consulate. He will learn things he could never learn from books.

Usually the young secretary in the past has gone from the law school or the college right into the foreign service. He has had no opportunity to know business or to learn business methods. He has had no advantage in age or experience which gives him a sufficiently level head to withstand the temptations of society abroad. I have seen very young men go into the foreign service. They were incessantly invited out to dinner, fêted and treated with distinction by people of fashion and position. They lost their heads and their Americanism at the same time. They lost their sense of perspective and values.

Do not think that I am speaking of all of them. I fear that I am speaking of a considerable portion of them. Now, if we start in a young man at the consulate he is not going to have a fuss made about him socially—he may be in Singapore or on the West Coast of Africa, or in Central America, where there is no society. He will learn business methods. He will acquire poise and sense and discrimination. He will learn to keep his head when later he is on duty at a European capital. He is going to be a more useful man to himself always, and that means that he is going to be a more valuable public servant to the United States. He will have a grasp of business and trade and politics. We shall get rid of the caste system, of a system where the diplomatic side of the service sometimes looks down on the consular side. We shall create a spirit of loyalty to a single unified foreign service and not primarily loyalty to the side of the service to which the individual member belongs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Is there any increased facility in educational institutions for the training which the gentleman has mentioned for the Consular Service?

Mr. ROGERS. More and more institutions are giving courses or groups of courses which are adapted to the training of young men for the foreign service.

But to my mind—and important as the academic training is—far beyond what any educational institution can do is the going to school in the consulate. I want to see a man enter the service with thorough knowledge of at least one foreign language, with knowledge of international law, with knowledge of the methods of foreign commerce and intercourse, and so forth, so that he will start as far along on his journey as possible. Then I want him to go to the most practical school in the world—the school in the consular office abroad.

Mr. FESS. Is it necessary in order to get into the diplomatic service to start in the Consular Service, if this bill should pass?

Mr. ROGERS. It is not necessary, but I hope that a wise administration of this bill will insist that every man when he enters the service as a young man shall get a good stiff course in the Consular Service. That is the business part of the Government abroad.

Mr. FESS. I am somewhat confused at a statement that Mr. Hughes made. I refer now to page 5 of the hearings. He said:

The bill does not make a diplomatic officer out of one who is not a diplomatic officer.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true. When a man is representing us abroad he is known to the country of his post as either a diplomatic officer or as a consular officer, because that is the only nomenclature they understand. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] suggests that perhaps we could reform the situation in that respect by eliminating secretaries and consuls as such. It is possible that we could. As I answered him, I think we get all the benefits of the change by creating a foreign service in which these men may be transferred freely as a matter of administration from one side to the other.

Mr. FESS. Will the two functions, diplomatic and consular, remain separate and distinct after we pass this bill?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; in general. We shall still, in London, for example, have a consul general and also an embassy force, although the consul general will be a foreign officer of class 1 in our superstructure, so far as domestic classification and salary are concerned.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman understands that I am in entire sympathy with the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I appreciate greatly the gentleman's support.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Has the gentleman ever considered the desirability and practicability of maintaining a diplomatic and consular school in the State Department, just as we do for the Army service, just as we do for the Navy service, with instruction in a classroom, practical experience in the consulates and legations and embassies? It is a technical training, and I think it would be a wonderful thing to do.

Mr. ROGERS. I have given a great deal of thought to that question. In an earlier draft of this bill I had a provision for very much the thing the gentleman has in mind. Mr. Hughes, in going over my original proposal, recommended that for the present at least the school idea be not considered. If the gentleman has the opportunity he will find in a letter to me from the Secretary of State, which appears on page 61 of the hearings, an analysis of the reasons that led him to postpone the recommendation for the present, at least.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us how much this bill is going to cost?

Mr. ROGERS. With pleasure. Before I mention the exact figure—and I will mention it—I should like to indicate why it is necessary to have a salary revision. As I have said, the salary scale of the consular service is from $1,500 up to $12,000, and of the diplomatic service from $2,500 to $4,000, although the top diplomatic officer is fully comparable in the importance of his duties and in his presumed ability with the top officer in the consular service. Suppose you have this situation: We have a counselor of embassy at London, with a salary of $4,000, and we have a consul general at London with a salary of $12,000. If for some administrative reason it is desirable to transfer that consul general to another post as a counselor, you would have to cut his salary from $12,000 down to $4,000. That is an extreme case, of course, but you find the same situation existing in some degree everywhere. So we have assimilated the two salary scales. We have started the top class of the foreign service officer at $9,000, and we have graduated it down to $3,000.

The total cost of this bill per year will be not far from $325,000. Mr. Hughes said that in his judgment it was the most efficient expenditure of money which the United States could possibly make, and he closed his testimony with these words:

Protect the Government from wasteful outlay. I am for that strongly, but do not hurt your Government by foolish economy.

This is going to cost, as I say, about $325,000 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. More than it now costs?

Mr. ROGERS. More than it now costs.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I am against it.

Mr. ROGERS. I thought so.

I want to call to the attention of gentlemen the fact that the foreign service of the United States is to-day practically self-supporting. Within the last three years it has been absolutely self-supporting, and only the passage of the Johnson 3 per cent immigration law has prevented it from being self-supporting during the last year. For the current year it is costing about $3,000,000 net. I think when you consider the manifold agencies and usefulness of this department in representing the country all over the world you will see that it is not top-heavy either in salary or in the outlay it involves to the Government. Remember that this is the department of peace. Contrast the cost with that of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. HUSTED. Might I say incidentally in that connection that the revenues of the Department of State cover the entire cost of maintaining the foreign service abroad.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not going to discuss the retirement provision at this time—

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my rising was to ask the gentleman to make some explanation of the retirement feature.

Mr. ROGERS. But my time is almost up.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood that the gentleman had yielded 30 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. It was not my purpose to use so much time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the committee is very considerate of the gentleman—

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will yield me five minutes additional, I will try to answer.

Mr. PORTER. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire on what basis the committee arrived at the fixing of the maximum and minimum annuities for the retirement of the foreign-service officers?

Mr. ROGERS. We considered various factors in arriving at those particular figures in the retirement section. We considered, in the first place, what the other countries of the world were doing in the way of retirement, and found they were retiring their officers in general on a percentage which ranged from about 65 per cent to 87 per cent of their salaries. Our maximum, as the gentleman will notice, is 60 per cent after 30 years' service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the determinate factor, so far as the legislation the gentleman has reported is concerned, as to the annuity that these various officers shall receive in the respective classes?

Mr. ROGERS. As I say, we were guided somewhat by the practice which has prevailed for some years in other nations. Great Britain has a maximum of 87 per cent for her retirement in the case of a long-service officer, and Great Britain, as I desire the gentleman especially to note, has a noncontributory system. She does not require a penny of contribution from her foreign-service employees. We require a contribution of 5 per cent of the salary calculated on the basis of the Lehlbach civil service retirement law.

Mr. STAFFORD. But what is the determinate factor of the rate they will receive between the maximum and minimum? Is that left entirely to the discretion of the department in determining the rate of retirement?

Mr. ROGERS. I think I did not understand the gentleman's question fully. In the first place, the determinate factor is the number of years he has served. That factor throws him into one of the classes lettered A-F, inclusive. The second factor is the average salary—which we call the "average basis salary" in the Lehlbach law—for a period of 10 years prior to the date of retirement. Suppose a man is getting $3,000 for 3 years and $4,000 for 4 years and $5,000 for 3 years and then retires. His average salary for the 10 years would be about $4,000. If he had served 30 years he would get 60 per cent of that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is your provision in the bill that states that he shall receive 60 per cent or any other percentage?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will notice the Lehlbach law is made determinative except as amended. If he will refer to the Lehlbach law he will find that the method of computing the retirement allowance is set forth in full.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has any estimate been made as to the amount that will be required by reason of this retirement feature?

Mr. ROGERS. On that matter we have had the assistance of the actuaries in the State Department. We have also had the assistance of private insurance companies. The Bureau of Efficiency has very carefully charted an estimate in ways which, I am frank to say, are quite beyond my comprehension. For the first 20 or 25 years under the operation of the law it will cost nothing, because the contributions will exceed the outlay. After that there will be a gradual increase of cost which must be appropriated by the Federal Government, and which will ultimately rise to its peak of about $400,000 per year.

Mr. STAFFORD. And is that in addition to the gentleman's estimate of $325,000 to $350,000 for salaries alone?

Mr. ROGERS. Three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is the cost in salary alone. About 1960 the retirement cost will rise for a time to about $400,000. Then it is expected to decline somewhat gradually.

Mr. BLANTON. Then our great-grandchildren will not be taxed so heavily?

Mr. ROGERS. They will have to pay a little more for the retirement of foreign-service officers—

Mr. BLANTON. How much has been estimated it will require for the retirement during the first 10 years of this law?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The first 10 years it will not cost anything. They will meet the bill for the first 10 years, except $50,000 as the initial payment.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman from Wisconsin is interested—

Mr. STAFFORD. I am greatly interested.

Mr. ROGERS. Until 1944 the receipts from the 5 per cent payment of the employees will more than balance the payments of annuities. After that there will be necessary a gradually increasing appropriation until the sum of about $400,000 is reached about 1960. Then it will begin to sag again.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. PORTER. I yield the gentleman two minutes additional.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this increase the number in the foreign service?

Mr. ROGERS. There is no intention in this bill of increasing by one man the number of the personnel of the foreign service. My authority is Director Carr, of the Consular Service. He testifies that the result of this greater flexibility will be to reduce somewhat the number of men necessary, because we shall be able to use the same man in more different ways than we have ever been able to do before.

Mr. DOWELL. And to better advantage?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And the gentleman remembers Director Carr said in his testimony that we could confidently forecast that there would be no need of increasing the number of personnel.

Mr. ROGERS. I thank the gentleman. He made that explicit statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am forced to announce an opinion contrary to that of my colleague on the committee, Mr. ROGERS, of Massachusetts. For years the gentleman from Massachusetts has been endeavoring to secure the enactment of legislation similar to that now before the committee.

In this connection I may say that I am not averse to legislation reorganizing the foreign service and increasing to a slight degree the compensation of the consuls and diplomatic secretaries. But this particular bill, in undertaking to establish what is called a unified foreign service, confuses, as I believe, and makes contradictory the provisions as they will be construed abroad, and, for that matter, here at home. One of the purposes of this bill is to unify—if I may borrow the language of the gentlemen who favor this bill—unify the service and create one foreign service and appoint officers in that service under the nomenclature of foreign-service officers. But, gentlemen of the committee, that will be purely a theoretical designation. It will have no force or effect anywhere on earth except on the books of the State Department. We frequently hear it said that a Treasury balance or fund is simply a matter of bookkeeping. In this instance the designation of foreign-service officer will simply be a matter of bookkeeping and administration in the State Department.

Now, why? Because the moment the foreign-service officer leaves the shores of the United States and comes in contact with the diplomatic or consular officers of other countries he ceases to be a foreign-service officer; he becomes a consul, or a diplomatic secretary, or a minister, or ambassador.

They know no other distinction; they know no other classification; and this artificial theory of a man being a foreign-service officer will be unknown abroad. The gentlemen who appeared before the committee and the gentleman from Massachusetts himself [Mr. ROGERS] will not dispute the fact that such designation is purely a fiction, purely a fictitious designation, which will obtain only in the State Department in its assignment of the personnel from one service to the other.

My idea about that is that if it is desirable to provide for the interchangeability of men from the Diplomatic Service to the Consular Service, simply write a clause into this bill saying so; saying that the President may transfer a man from the Consular Service into the diplomatic secretarial corps, or vice versa.

Now, let me show you with what you are going to be confronted in connection with this particular bill. The bill first provides that a man who is appointed in the foreign service shall be appointed as a foreign-service officer. He is appointed by the President as a foreign-service officer. That appointment goes to the Senate; he is confirmed; he is commissioned as a foreign-service officer. And yet under that commission he can not perform a single duty. Why? Because under the Constitution and under the diplomatic and international law, if he acts as a consul, he must be reappointed by the President as a consul, reconfirmed by the Senate, and recommissioned.

Now, if after that officer is commissioned as a consul it is desired by the President that he be transferred into the Diplomatic Service as a secretary, he then must be appointed by the President as a diplomatic secretary, confirmed by the Senate, and have a new commission issued to him. So you are going to have the rather anomalous situation of a foreign-service officer lugging three commissions around. He is a foreign-service officer, he is a consul, and he is a diplomatic secretary.

Now, gentlemen, I want to ask, Why the necessity? If he must be commissioned otherwise finally, if he has to be commissioned finally as a diplomatic secretary or consul, what is the use of lugging in another commission as a foreign-service officer? Why not provide by law simply that the President may transfer from one branch of the service to the other at his will and end it there?

The gentleman from Massachusetts touched upon a delicate point. Those in the Consular Service desire an enlarged service because the diplomatic secretaries now take social precedence over all the consuls, vice consuls, and employees in the Consular Service. They desire a unified service, that social distinctions may be abolished. Why? Because in foreign countries diplomatic secretaries have the privilege of immunity. They have a certain social standing that does not attach to consuls and vice consuls. And so, upon the theory that by adopting this fiction, this theoretical structure in which there will be one unified foreign service, it is hoped by the Department of State to tear down those social distinctions.

Well, now, gentlemen, those social distinctions are created by the customs of foreign governments. We are not going to change that system, and I do not think it is any part of our duty to undertake to change it, because if this bill becomes a law the consul abroad will still be a consul in France, in Great Britain, and elsewhere. They will know whether you are a consul or a secretary in France and Germany and everywhere else under the bill. They do not know a foreign-service officer. A man will not be a foreign-service officer, but he will be a consul or a diplomatic secretary, just as he is to-day.

Now, another feature of this bill which does not meet with my approval is that wherein the act provides for a reclassification of everybody now in the service. Well, there is no objection to that in itself, but it provides for nine classifications, beginning with the maximum salary of $9,000 and then going down toward the bottom.

There is nothing in the bill limiting the percentage of the different grades. By that I mean that according to my view class 1 should not contain in excess, say, of 10 per cent or 5 per cent of the total personnel. Class 2 ought to be a little larger, class 3 still a little larger, and so on down. But under this bill there is no limitation as to the classification, and we might be confronted with a situation in which under this bill the Department of State might have a top-heavy organization, with a great many men receiving $9,000 and $8,000 and a very few men receiving $5,000, $4,000, or $3,000.

Mr. BLACK. The bill gives the Secretary of State the exclusive authority to make the reclassification, does it not?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The President; but it would amount, of course, to the Secretary of State.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman will recall that when we passed the reclassification bill we provided that the departments should reclassify subject to the approval and ratification of the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think the general reclassification bill covers officers covered by this bill and hereafter called foreign-service officers.

Mr. BLACK. No; it does not, though probably the principle would cover them. But if the reclassification was to be done by the President, probably he would consult the Bureau of the Budget or some authority of that kind.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. He probably would. The Bureau of the Budget seems to be occupying a very large part of the public eye now, and I am quite sure that the administration would call upon it.

Mr. BLACK. The point I had in mind was that of economy, because, as the gentleman has well said, the bill does not restrict the classification, and there would be room for a very great enlargement of the expenses of the Diplomatic and Consular Service by this reclassification.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is very true, and that is the point I was trying to bring to the attention of the committee, that the bill in its present form places no limitation on the percentages of those who occupy the different classes.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that the appropriations for the State Department, including the foreign service, would prevent the Secretary of State from making too many appointments in class 1? Salaries can not be paid unless they are appropriated, and, of course, the purpose of the Secretary of State would be to have his administration as efficient as possible, so that he would grade them down just as they should be.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Of course, if everybody did right there would be no occasion for law. But let me state this to the gentleman, that if the law provides for the classification of an officer and vests in the Secretary of State the power to make that classification, then the officer placed in that classification becomes entitled to the salary of that class, because that then becomes a statutory position, and he becomes entitled to the compensation from the Government at that rate irrespective of whether Congress makes the appropriation or not.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. The gentleman does not mean to say that a man would get any salary if there was not enough money in the appropriation to go around?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; of course, he could not be paid out of the Treasury until Congress appropriated for it; but I do say that Congress would be guilty of a moral wrong if it made it possible for a man to be classified and entitled to a certain salary, and then did not appropriate the money out of the Treasury to pay it.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I do not think there is any danger of the state of affairs which the gentleman seems to fear.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Then why not let the Secretary of State do this whole thing?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Because that would be contrary to law.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the gentleman does not want any limitations put upon the Secretary of State, then why not let him do as he pleases about this whole thing?

Mr. BLACK. I should like to ask my colleague one other question for information.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BLACK. This bill provides for the retirement of these foreign-service officers after they reach a certain age?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. And it provides a very liberal scale of annuities and provides that they shall contribute 5 per cent to the annuity fund?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Did any actuary give any figures as to what part of the retirement fund this 5 per cent would contribute?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It is supposed to contribute 42 per cent. That is the amount estimated to be contributed by the employees when the system is in full operation, and 58 per cent is to be paid by the Government.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, we know that at the start it will not cost the Government anything.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No.

Mr. BLACK. But, figuring it upon the basis of what the premium will really buy, ultimately the Government will contribute 58 per cent and the employees will contribute 42 per cent?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes. I will say in answer to my colleague that the figures that were submitted to us by the State Department and which we accepted at their face value were based upon the theory that under the Lehlbach law, as modified so far as this act applies, ultimately the Government would pay 58 per cent of the retirement fund and the employees 42 per cent.

Now, since the gentleman has called my attention to the retirement fund, I should like to observe that this feature is rather seductive in that it is claimed it will not cost the Government anything until 1944 because of the fact that in the meantime the employees will be contributing a larger percentage than will be consumed by those who retire. That is a matter of speculation, and it may or may not be realized. But in 1944 the retirement feature will begin to cost the Government considerable, and it is estimated, even by the Department of State, that ultimately the retirement feature alone will cost this Government $500,000 a year. The retirement provision is extremely liberal, more so than that which applies to any other Government service unless it be the Army and the Navy. I submit that there is no comparison between the foreign service and the Army and the Navy when it comes to the matter of retirement. Besides, the Army and Navy have had the retirement system since early in our history, and they are not up for consideration now as to whether they shall be continued or abolished.

But I do believe that the retirement provision is more liberal than this Government ought to sanction. It is much more liberal than that which applies to any civil department of the Government. If we have a liberal plan as to the foreign-service officers it will be an inducement and an argument for the raising of the rate of all in the governmental service in Washington and elsewhere. My own view of the matter is that the system of itself is of extremely doubtful value. In this particular service I do not believe that the Government ought to undertake it.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I shall be glad to.

Mr. BLACK. If the retirement provision was stricken out, the employment would come under the general retirement law.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. They claim not; they are not under the civil service.

Mr. BLACK. I thought this would bring them under the civil service; I knew that the present status was not under the civil service.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; this is a revision of the law of 1915; this has several civil-service features, but they are not under the civil service; the department conducts its own examinations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

If you put the foreign service under the general retirement act they would only pay 2½ per cent instead of 5 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is true.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They would not pay so large a retirement pay.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is true.

Mr. BLACK. And the charge upon the Treasury would be very much less.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes; so far as percentages go. Now, let me observe that the increase of salary alone under this bill—and I am not objecting to a reasonable increase of salary in the foreign service, because there are many positions in the foreign service that have not kept pace with other salaries. I do not object to an increase of salary, provided there are limits placed in the bill so that the Department of State can not have a great many high-salaried persons and very few with small salaries. The increase in salary alone amounts to $528,000 annually.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Three hundred thousand.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; the $200,000 is subtracted for post allowances. I am not talking about post allowances. The department estimates the increase in salary alone will amount to $528,000. We have been providing for several years what is known as post allowances. The department subtracts the $200,000 from the $528,000 increase, and says that the net cost is only $328,000; but from the standpoint of salary alone the increase is $528,000, and in addition to that the bill provides for another increase of $500,000 in the matter of retirement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not sure but that my colleague is right; but when there is a difference between my colleague and the chairman of the committee, who introduced the bill, of $175,000 in salaries alone, how does the gentleman expect us to follow him and vote for his bill?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will state that the confusion arises—

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will turn to page 27 of the hearings he will find that Mr. Carr said that the total increase is only $328,000. The amount for the first year would be $378,000, because there is included $50,000 to start the retirement system. The increase for the Consular Service would be minus the retirement fund of $261,000. Take off half for post allowances and you would have $161,000 really.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I just explained to the committee that that was exactly the situation—that the increase in the matter of salaries is $528,000. We have been in the habit of appropriating $200,000 for post allowances, and that amount subtracted from the $528,000 would leave a net increase of $328,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the salaries are increased $500,000, necessarily we will have to appropriate the $500,000, while if it is left with post allowances we could decrease them or leave them off altogether; so that the legal increase which is necessary is $528,000?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Exactly. The gentleman may remember that when the Diplomatic and Consular bill was recently before the House, I contended that post allowances should be abolished, because I think it is a reprehensible practice to place large sums of money in the hands of the department for this purpose without reference to the salary established by law.

The bill liberally increases salaries. Of course, if you consult a foreign-service officer he thinks he is not drawing enough money. If you consult any one of the Senators, I suppose there is not one who would not admit that he is worth more than the salary he is drawing. I am satisfied that in our blushing modesty here in the House Members will be found who think that they ought to draw more money. I dare say there is not a clerk in the department who does not think that he ought to have a better job and more money. It is inherent in the public service, but there is the great world outside that invites gentlemen to enter industrial or commercial pursuits if they are not satisfied with the jobs they have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is always argued that gentlemen in the Diplomatic Service and in the Consular Service could get much higher compensation on the outside than they get in the service. Of course there are exceptional men in the Consular Service and there are exceptional men in the Diplomatic Service who might go out into other business and after becoming acquainted with it earn more money than they earn in those services, just as there are men on the floor of this House who if they should leave it and undertake to practice law would earn more money, possibly, than they receive here. So it is in all branches of the Government service. We can not compete with private business in the matter of salaries, and we ought not to attempt to do it, because it is impractical and because it is not a sound governmental theory. What are the services that a consular agent performs? He performs largely routine service. That service is largely standardized, dealing with commercial transactions and the viséing of passports and things of that kind. Of course, no man with a vaulting ambition, who wants to accomplish great things in the world, is going to be satisfied to be stuck off in some little foreign port with some $2,500 a year salary, but if he is not he is not going to go there. We can not adjust the compensation of those in the governmental service with private service commanding large compensation, though this bill does make liberal allowances in the matter of increase.

Most of those in the service remain in the service not because of the salary but because they like this particular kind of work, just as you gentlemen keep these seats here because you like congressional work and congressional service. You need not be afraid that this service is going to be crippled if you strike from this bill the retirement feature. Gentlemen were before our committee saying that the foreign service was going to the bowwows unless we raised their salaries and unless we adopted a retirement feature. I said to one of them: "What is the matter with our foreign service? Is it the worst in the world? Have we not capable men?" He replied: "Oh, yes; our personnel is as fine as there is in the world." You see he was not looking for a question from that angle. They will admit that the United States has as competent and capable a foreign service as any nation, and in the next breath they will tell you that unless we raise these salaries and adopt this retirement feature, the service is going to vanish from the face of the earth.

I would not object to a reasonable increase in the salaries of these officers and I do not object to the reclassification of the consular and diplomatic secretaries into nine classes, but I would limit the percentage of those who could occupy the higher positions, and I would wipe out the provisions about the foreign service being unified into one service, when, as a matter of fact, some officers will have to have three commissions and have to be confirmed by the Senate three times, if interchangeability, so that they may change from one side of the docket to the other, is provided as defined in this bill. For these reasons I am going to vote against this bill unless it is materially modified or amended.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill and expect to vote for it or be paired in favor of it in case I am not here. I consider that it fulfills a great requirement; in fact, a necessity, if we ever expect to build up the foreign service of this country.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting therein certain correspondence and documents affecting our foreign affairs in 8-point type.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by including therein certain letters to be printed in 8-point type. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

LONG BEACH, CALIF., January 31, 1923.

EDITOR OF THE TELEGRAM,

Long Beach, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Why do the citizens of this country keep so quiet about the French occupation of German territory?

I freely admit that it is not the place of the Government to voice the country's sentiment at this time, as for reasons well known. Our Government's inaction, however, does not signify that the people of America can not express their attitude during this trying time of France.

What is this measure France has undertaken?

Is France unjust in her requirements of Germany?

Should not this country stand as a unit back of France?

Are we afraid to speak?

Should we unfold our arms to a bandit that utilized every known method of science to deceive, in shrewd and cunning ways, to trample on, bleed, and destroy our very existence, who has not even said "I am sorry for what I have done"?

Why, then, should we give the blood of America's youth to batter down one of the arch criminals of nations in one breath and then, without repentance of any sort from that bandit or arch criminal nation, cast aside friends that have risked all and their sons died on the field of battle for us?

A bandit should have his punishment meted out to him in a lawful manner, and when once that sentence is given it should be carried out to its fullest degree.

The Germans started the war. The Germans disregarded all the treaties and agreements of other nations and started on their mad maniac rush to crush Belgium and France. The lives of Belgian and French peaceful citizens were mere pawns in their crazed onslaught.

The Germans devastated every piece of territory they could on Belgian or French soil.

When they saw they were whipped they came out like a beaten cur dog, with its tail between its legs, and asked "us" to stop the fight. We like fools did stop it before we got even one word of repentance from Germany.

What did we get for stopping the war? This is what we got: "A piece of paper from the German people guaranteeing certain indemnities to help restore France and Belgium for the fiendish acts of their own soldiers." This, by the way, was given not to fulfill but "just as a scrap of paper," as is the popular German phrase of to-day.

Had Germany fulfilled her promise or even acted in good faith on the matter, I will say France would not be on German soil to-day.

France and Belgium were burglarized, and Germany has the plunder or can help to make it good.

Germany's deceitful and cunning tactics are at work trying to win the United States' heart in their support.

Down with all of that cunning, and let the American citizens come out for the full and unaltered support of France and Belgium against a willful and dangerous neighbor.

I have not lost sight of the fact that there are many citizens of Germany that did all in their power to avoid the terrible war and that to-day are doing all in their power to have Germany live up to its word. These people, however, are in the minority and powerless to act.

France did not make this move for conquest. If she did, I would not be writing this letter, as I would not be a party to any such act.

France knows better than anyone else how to treat the situation and knows how and the only way to get results from a nation that has lost all honor of word and treaty except at the point of the sword.

How I have lauded France in her determination to get justice against Great Britain, which was weak-kneed; against, it seemed, with few loyal exceptions, all other nations, that were either afraid to speak or that had forgotten overnight that France buried millions of her sons and lost great expanses of their beloved land through devastation to save the very land they called theirs and to save the standards of society for their own nation.

I am not alone in this interpretation of the situation.

The land is full of smoldering sentiment; and, scheme as the Germans may, the pot is going to boil over, and then and soon will come the true moral and, if necessary, financial support from the American people to the French and Belgians.

I dread war, and yet I believe that to check a disease it is a good plan to either entirely eliminate its cause or else shut off its wind.

Senator REED's frank and heated speech on this subject in the Senate a few days ago was one of the best treats to the American people in some time.

France is to be admired in the way she is using her power of arms on the German people. May she continue to be patient and just, as she has been; but if it is metal that Germany must have to bring her to justice, may France and Belgium have the power of God to lead them on.

Tell, please, dear editor, through your great voice The Telegram, how at least one citizen of America is back of my friends, your friends, and our friends, France and Belgium, that they may have courage to bring about justice that is due not only them but the whole world.

Above all, let us express ourselves now that Germany's apparent woeful tales are fully understood in this country, and that Germany's disease is "no honor," and that the "cure" she is trying to administer through propaganda against France has proven on some patients somewhat easing at times, but the patients have generally changed doctors in time to prevent death.

A bandit?

A proven friend?

Which for the American people?

Very truly yours,

GEO. S. WILSON,

728 Cedar, Long Beach, Calif.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we are operating now under strange conditions. This morning, without even the majority leaders knowing what was coming up—because I asked several members of the steering committee, and they could not tell me—our friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], chairman of the Committee on Rules, pulled out of his hip pocket a rule that made this bill in order. Under ordinary conditions there should have been at least 20 minutes of debate on a side to explain what the rule meant and what would be the result of its adoption. Yet no explanation of the bill was given to the House, and it was a long time after the rule was adopted and general debate began before we got even a partial explanation of the contents of this bill. The author of the bill—and I might say that it is one of his pet measures, which he has been fathering here for quite a while—when I asked him how much it was going to cost, said that it would increase present expenses about $325,000 in salaries, and then later, when I asked my colleague from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is also on the committee, the same question, he tells us that in salaries alone it is going to cost $528,000 a year more than the present law, and in addition to that it is going to cost $500,000 more for retirement features. Therefore, how can we safely follow the gentleman from Massachusetts? How can the gentleman from Massachusetts expect the ordinary Congressman, such as I am, to follow him and vote for the bill?

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I have not the time.

Mr. HUSTED. Just for one brief question. I want to refer to something the gentleman said awhile ago.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will get me more time I should be very glad to yield for 40 questions.

Mr. HUSTED. It will take only a very short time.

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not yield; my time is limited. I do not fail to yield when I have plenty of time. If the gentleman will procure me extra time, I shall be very glad to yield.

We ordinary Members of Congress know that there has been pending before the Navy Department here for several years the question of seniority in social functions, of whether a rear admiral of the second class in going in to dinner outranks a brigadier general; and just within the last few days a decision has been handed down that it all depends upon which one got his commission first. In the great United States, exclusive of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, theoretically all men are presumed to be born free and equal; that is the presumption.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts has brought in a bill here which makes nine different ranks for these social diplomats we have in the foreign service—nine different ranks illustrated by nine rungs on a ladder. Some men in our Diplomatic Service will have to stop and wait for nine different rungs of the social ladder to be formed before they can go in to dinner.

Mr. ROGERS. Would the gentleman abolish the distinction between a general and a private?

Mr. BLANTON. At social functions in peace time, yes. In America there ought not to be any distinction of rank in peace times at social functions. There ought not to be any such distinction. An American citizen is an American citizen. In war time it is, of course, different. But the humblest citizens in Massachusetts or Texas ought to have the same standing as Americans in this country or abroad, as the most prominent citizens of the United States have where they are the same color and of equal respectability. The people down in Texas feel that way, but the people in Massachusetts do not. They want these nine different rungs of the social ladder, these nine different rungs of social distinction in peace times; and I think we ought not to adopt such a policy. I think it is the biggest foolishness on earth for us to pass this bill. We talk about economy. Any man who votes for this bill ought never again to be allowed to preach economy in government. Why, our expenses are climbing up all the time—each day they are climbing up and getting larger and larger—and yet we are responsible when we continue to vote for bill after bill like this which in salaries alone raises the cost to the people who pay the taxes $528,000 a year in increased salaries alone, and in its retirement feature about $500,000 more. I am not going to vote for it, and I want to serve notice on the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts right now that when we reach the five-minute rule I am going to require him to keep a quorum here every moment of the time until he passes this bill.

You can not pass it with a little handful of Members such as we have in this House to-day. I have not made the point of no quorum at this session for a filibuster, not one. I have sat here patiently—the only times I have made a point of no quorum was to get a record vote on a bill, but I am going to do it on this bill. I am going to require you to keep a quorum here, and if the Chairman gives us a good, honest count you are going to have 100 men here all during the reading of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Texas that he will give an honest count.

Mr. BLANTON. I was sure of it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair resents the insinuation just cast upon him.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did the gentleman think it was necessary to get this assurance?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I have heard it said, and it may have also happened before I came here, but I have heard it said that sometimes expediency and expediency may cause a quorum to be counted when possibly the employees of the House had to be added to make 100. Expediency and expediency—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BLANTON. Expediency to proceed with business. When we look around and see about 40 to 60 Members sometimes I have heard it said that there would be a count of 100. That is the reason I mentioned the fact that I was sure the occupant of the Chair was going to give us a good count. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois is not willing on one proposition alone, in this day of retrenchment, to increase the expenses of this Government over $800,000 a year. I am sure he is not willing to do that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I arose to express my disapproval of the gentleman's suggestion that the present occupant of the Chair at any time, or any other occupant at any time, would conduct himself in such a way as to warrant the aspersion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, I think more highly of the present occupant of the Chair than the gentleman from Illinois does and all other chairmen, although I do not agree with the present occupant sometimes. I like him as much as anybody here does, but I have seen expediency cause even the expert parliamentarian, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], when Chairman, to overlook the fact that some sitting back here might not be Members, might be the amiable Sergeant at Arms, or the Clerk or Doorkeeper, or some other distinguished-looking gentleman like our friend from Kansas—Assistant Sergeant at Arms—over here, who sits here to make a quorum sometimes. [Laughter.] That is the only reason I mentioned it. But this bill ought not to pass, and I think if we can get the membership here so they will understand it, it will not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for several months past there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction regarding conditions existing in the Veterans' Bureau. On March 17 of last year I called attention to the matter in House Resolution No. 306, which I introduced at that time. The provisions of the resolution were such that I believe if action of the House could have been obtained at that time much of the criticism now being made of the Veterans' Bureau throughout the country, and much of the extravagance which undoubtedly exists, if newspaper reports are to be credited, would have been avoided. The resolution directs the appointment of an investigating committee and in part is as follows:

That said committee be, and is hereby, instructed and directed to inquire into the conditions and operations of the Veterans' Bureau in the management and control of claims for compensation, allotments, insurance, vocational training, and all other matters over which said bureau has jurisdiction, to determine whether or not said bureau is efficient and economical in the management of its affairs.

Said committee is especially directed to investigate the management, control, and operation of the several regional offices of the Veterans' Bureau authorized under the act of August 9, 1921, with view of determining whether the creation of said regional offices has resulted in efficiency, economy, and expedition in the management of claims submitted to it for adjudication, and generally to investigate and report on all things affecting the welfare, management, and results obtained by operation of the said bureau at its central and regional offices and suboffices.

The press dispatches of to-day are to the effect that Director Forbes has decided to resign. At least the indications are that his successor is about to be appointed. If he has at last obtained his own consent to retire from the bureau, it may now be considered as unanimous, for I am sure no one will object.

One of the press dispatches is as follows:

PREDICT DRASTIC CHANGES IN UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU—SHAKE-UP IN PERSONNEL AND METHODS OF OPERATION DUE, SAY WELL-INFORMED OFFICIALS—LEGAL DIVISION IS CENTER OF STORM—BELIEVE FORBES, NOW IN EUROPE, WILL NOT RETURN AS DIRECTOR OF ORGANIZATION.

[By the Associated Press.]

WASHINGTON, February 1.—The administration of the Veterans' Bureau, for months a subject of bitter controversy, is undergoing an investigation which is expected by some well-informed officials here to result in important readjustments.

How far the proposed changes will go in the direction of a complete overthrow of bureau personnel and methods of operation remains to be determined by President Harding, but it would cause no surprise among his closest advisers if shifts recently made among bureau officials were followed by others more far-reaching.

The inquiry is understood to have been undertaken after many charges of improper administration had reached the White House from the American Legion and other sources and after Members of Congress had about perfected a plan to ask for a public congressional investigation.

The storm center of the controversy appears to be the legal division of the bureau, which has the final say on all contracts for hospital sites and other contracts involved in the Government's program of veteran aid. Charles R. Cramer, who, as general counsel for the bureau, was head of the legal division, retired to-day from office after he had announced that he would leave it to Col. Charles R. Forbes, the bureau director, to say whether his services were any longer considered desirable.

SEE FORBES'S SUGGESTION.

Now, Colonel Forbes himself is en route to Europe for a "rest" and administration of the bureau is in other hands. Some of the colonel's friends do not expect him to return to his desk, although administration officials insist that he is in no sense under "suspension." They are unwilling to predict whether he will be asked to step out or will voluntarily give up his directorship.

In any case, the question of selecting a new director is receiving serious consideration, and it is predicted generally that Col. Thomas W. Miller, now Alien Property Custodian, will be first choice for the place. Colonel Miller, however, is believed to prefer to stay at his present post, and it is said that the selection may fall ultimately on Frank D'Olier, who was the first national commander of the American Legion.

Officials will not talk about the facts already turned up by the present inquiry. William J. Burns, chief of the Justice Department's Investigation Bureau, declined to-day to discuss the case or to confirm reports that his agents had been at work on it. Officials of the Veterans' Bureau itself professed ignorance of whether any part had been taken in the inquiry by anyone connected with the Department of Justice.

HANDLE LARGE SUMS.

The legal division of the Veterans' Bureau is called on daily to pass judgment on expenditures that run into enormous totals. During the present fiscal year the money involved in contracts which pass through the hands of the general counsel and his subordinates has amounted to $400,000,000. These expenditures are made from a "lump-sum" appropriation of Congress, and it has been pointed out that it would be surprising if in the handling of so large an amount some part of the appropriation was not diverted for purposes other than those Congress had in mind in authorizing the expenditure.

Another phase, that of the employment of civilians, is understood to be receiving the attention of the President's advisers. Thousands of claims of disabled veterans and others entitled to aid are passed upon by the legal staff, and not the least of the complaints of critics of the bureau have been aimed at what has been termed lack of sympathy within the legal department with the problems and needs of the veterans.

Bureau officials contend that the legal division employs 14 civilians to 17 World War veterans. If the former were all discharged and inexperienced former service men replaced them it would materially retard the work of granting proper claims, these officials assert.

It is a pity that so great an organization as the Veterans' Bureau should be so inefficient and should bring down, not only upon the administration but upon the country at large, such slanderous conditions as are indicated by the press. Let me call your attention to another article which appeared in one of the local papers, the Herald, I believe, under date of February 2. It reads as follows:

BURNS PROBES VETS' BUREAU EXPENDITURES—DRASTIC ACTION BY PRESIDENT MAY RESULT IF CHARGES OF ABUSE ARE PROVEN TO BE TRUE.

Investigations being made by the Department of Justice of expenditures for sites, rentals, and hospitals by the United States Veterans' Bureau probably will precipitate drastic action by President Harding, it became known yesterday.

SERIOUS CHARGES POSSIBLE.

The President has information concerning these outlays of Government funds made under the direction of certain bureau officials which, if proven, may result in serious charges being preferred.

Vast expenditures for rentals of buildings housing veterans' training schools, excessive purchase prices for hospital sites, and waste in connection with the use of hospital buildings after the projects had been completed are included in the matters under investigation by Director William J. Burns, of the Bureau of Investigation, and which have been placed before Mr. Harding.

Investigations so far do not connect the name of Director Charles R. Forbes with any of the irregularities.

PROJECTS UNDER PROBE.

While reports have been current in official circles for two weeks that a general clean-up of the Veterans' Bureau was to be expected, this is the first time that definite projects under investigation by the Department of Justice have been pointed out.

The following projects are said to be under investigation:

LIST OF RENTALS.

Rentals of $60,000 per year paid for a training school at Stockton, Calif., in which, it is said, there were no trainees registered October 1. Rentals of $12,000 per year paid for a training school at Richmond, Va., where 11 trainees are receiving instruction.

Think, gentlemen, of such extravagance as that, an expenditure of $60,000 a year, $5,000 per month, for rental of quarters in which not a single trainee is to be found; and of $12,000 a year paid for training quarters at Richmond, Va., where only 11 trainees are receiving instruction. But I read further:

Rentals of $152,000 per year at Nauvoo, Ill., where 176 veterans were receiving training on October 1.

A hospital site at Livermore, Calif., where a 400-bed hospital is authorized under the Langley bill at an expenditure of $1,302,720.

Excessive rentals paid for a training school at Goshen, N. Y. Hospital sites at Aspinwall, Pa.; Tupper Lake, Pa.; and Northampton, Mass.

Sale of supplies stored at Perryville, Md.

May I explain some things that I understand to exist regarding sales made at Perryville, Md., and which heretofore have not been brought out by the press? There was turned over to the Veterans' Bureau for distribution, it is said, in round numbers, about $3,000,000 worth of war material. It consisted of sheets, blankets, crockery, cutlery, and other articles, which were thought might be used by the Veterans' Bureau at hospitals, and so forth. It is said that Director Forbes concluded to dispose of it; that he went to one of the executive officers of the bureau and told him what his plans were, saying, in substance, "We will call a meeting of the executive officers, and you make a motion to sell the property." The meeting was called. The proceedings went off as per schedule previously prepared. A sale was had; but thereafter suspicion arose and General Sawyer went out to Perryville to see about conditions.

Here is what I understand he found the situation to be: The would-be purchaser of the goods was busily engaged in loading them on heavy trucks. In throwing a bundle it was burst. General Sawyer examined it and it developed that it was sheets of a high class, in every way suitable for use in the hospitals under operation by the Veterans' Bureau. The general made inquiries as to what they were sold for. He was told that they had been sold at 20 cents apiece. He, being an expert in such line, said, "They were worth $2 apiece." There were also blankets sold for $1 apiece, and which, as I am informed, were afterwards sold in Boston at wholesale for $4 apiece. General Sawyer returned to Washington, as the report goes, and brought the matter to the attention of the President. Upon investigation it developed that the sale was illegal, in that rules and regulations require that at least three bids should be submitted. In this case only one was submitted. So the sale was canceled and the party was not permitted to remove the goods.

What a pity that the transaction did not end there; but, as the report goes, another sale was ordered. Other bids were called for. Three bids were made, as the rules and regulations provide. Sale was had, and after it had been confirmed and the Government's property had been disposed of, a party who suspected the good faith of the transaction got into communication with one of the parties who submitted a bid. He told him that he understood the sale had not been had in good faith, and that if this were true some one would suffer, but that the person who told the truth about the matter would not be greatly punished, if at all.

The party is said to have admitted that he was one of the three who submitted bids; that he did not submit the bid in good faith; that he submitted it in order to make up the required number of three bidders; and that he received crockery ware worth about $75,000 or $100,000 for making the bid, although he did not purchase the goods. I understand that the person who first tried to purchase under the one-bid proposition was the successful bidder at the second sale, and obtained the goods from the Government.

I desire to be perfectly fair to the membership of the House and to the others concerned. Therefore I have endeavored to see if this statement could be substantiated. I have called upon the Veterans' Bureau two or three times for information, and as late as yesterday I was promised that I would be given it by 12 o'clock to-day. This morning, when I called again, some one—Mr. Brown, I believe it was; at any rate, an employee in the Veterans' Bureau—told me that the acting director had requested that all the papers pertaining to the transaction and the sale at Perryville, Md., be taken to his office in order that he might look into the matter, and that he wanted him or some other official at his office to go into the details of the transaction with him. Now, gentlemen, I have given you the information as I have it regarding that sale. I do not know what the facts are, but these reports are current and the truth should be known.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. McSWAIN. Has the gentleman investigated the law to see whether or not, if the facts are true as he is informed, these two false bidders who merely pretended they were bidding for the purpose of joining in the conspiracy to defraud the Government have committed an indictable offense?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I have made no special investigation, but I should say from my general knowledge of the law that all three of them were guilty of conspiracy.

Mr. McSWAIN. They would be indictable in my State under the common law.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Is there any Federal statute that would reach them?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I do not know. I have not made any special investigation as to that. If there is no such law there ought to be one.

Mr. McSWAIN. I will say that I will join my friend in swearing out a warrant for them if there is any such Federal statute.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I am sure the gentleman from Georgia will go as far as the gentleman from South Carolina, and I believe we will go as far as the circumstances require.

Mr. McSWAIN. Good.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. But, gentlemen, here is a difficulty. In the resolution for investigation, which I offered last March, I tried to point out to the membership of the House the things that were occurring not only at the central office but at many of the regional and subregional offices. I am afraid it is too late to investigate now when the transactions appear to have been completed. We might at that time, by proper action, have at least saved the saddle, but I fear the horse and saddle are both gone now. It may be too late to lock the barn door.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. The gentleman did not quite finish on the point of getting that information from the office of the acting director this morning. Did the gentleman ever get that information this morning?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I was finally told by the gentleman to whom I was talking that I might call on the acting director for it. I said to him, "Well, if the acting director does not know what the situation is and is simply calling on you or other parties to bring information to him, I assume I would hardly be able to get it at this time"; and he said, "I think probably you are correct," or words to that effect.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. So far as my colleague knows, all the data are in the hands of the acting director, who is supposed to be going over the matter now?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. So far as I know and believe, the acting director has the matter under consideration. I certainly trust he has.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. But the gentleman never did get the information, according to the promise he got from them?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I have never been able to obtain it yet, and as I could not obtain time to speak to-morrow I thought I ought to bring the information I have to the attention of the House to-day.

There are several other cases that perhaps are just as bad as this. There is a case said to be bad at Camp Kearney, Calif., and which needs investigation. I understand it has to do with the resignation of Mr. Cramer. I hope the House will bear with me while I state the facts with regard to the matter as I understand them. At Camp Kearney, Calif., the Government has been renting at a nominal sum of $1 per year certain quarters—trainee's quarters, hospital facilities, or something of that kind; I am not quite sure which.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Maryland give me time to finish?

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. About five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield to the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. It is said that certain parties interested in Camp Kearney property recently came to Washington and submitted a proposition to Mr. Cramer, who was at that time the head of the legal department of the Veterans' Bureau. They are said to have submitted a proposition which was accepted by the Government, and whereby the rent for Camp Kearney property was increased from $1 a year to $35,000 a year, with the option that after one year the rent should be increased to either $90,000 or $99,000 per year. That within itself perhaps is not a matter that would excite such great suspicion, if it were not followed, as the report goes, by another circumstance that seems very unusual. It is said that when this $35,000 contract and this option contract had been signed up, Mr. Cramer went down to the proper division where the checks or vouchers are issued and demanded that a check for $35,000 be issued that day to the parties to the contract. The officer in the Veterans' Bureau, I am told, refused to issue the check, and told him that under the rules and regulations of the department it would take several days to get such a matter through. It is said that finally a threat was made by Mr. Cramer to the effect that if the check was not issued that day somebody would lose his job, whereupon the underlying official obeyed orders and issued the check. It is also said that Mr. Cramer and the parties from California left that night on a trip to New York City and were there for several days.

Not only that, but I have been told that when the check came to the Comptroller General some two weeks ago he refused to approve its payment. I have endeavored to obtain more definite information on this matter but as yet have been unable to do so. I do not know whether the reports are correct or not, but I know they sound mighty bad. I know the people of the country do not know the facts. The taxpayers of the Nation are entitled to know. I think a bureau that employs approximately 30,000 people and spends more than $425,000,000 of the people's money per annum is an institution of sufficient importance that the Congress ought to take notice of what it is doing and so far as possible correct every evil connected with its administration.

Here may I be permitted to make a suggestion? It has been currently reported that there is an effort on foot to appoint a Veterans' Bureau committee. I want to give it my indorsement. I think it would be a good idea. There is pending before the House something like 200 bills affecting directly and indirectly the Veterans' Bureau. When they affect the Veterans' Bureau they affect every home and almost every individual in America. It is primarily for the benefit of the splendid boys who gave their services to the country in its hour of need. I think it would be the best thing for the House and for the country if we were to create a standing committee of the House to dispose of such matters. [Applause.]

[Mr. LARSEN of Georgia had leave to revise and extend his remarks.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the general subject of tariff legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker and members of the committee, I appreciate your graciousness in permitting me to present some observations concerning the operations of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. Having in mind the fact that there are numerous persons who can not grasp its full intent because of the fact that "politics" has hitherto been so associated with its consideration and the stress of campaigns has prevented an impartial consideration thereof, I venture at this time to present some concrete facts relative to the subject. If the line of the division between the two great parties is that of a protective "tariff" and a "tariff for revenue only," it seems to me that the only way for either of the great parties to secure the reins of government is by a candid presentation of what are the facts and not attempt to obtain office by distortion thereof or by innuendo or otherwise.

In attempting to present this matter in a clear and understandable manner permit me to use an argument advanced by a "free-trade" advocate.

At the other end of the Capitol one of the distinguished gentlemen who comes from a State that believes in a free-trade policy and a "tariff for revenue only" said recently that the operations of the Fordney-McCumber tariff would take "three billions out of the pockets" of the American people, meaning, I suppose, "unnecessarily and uselessly" so, thereby putting burdens which should not be inflicted upon the people. To the ordinary mind that is a large figure, but how can his statement be reconciled in the light of the clear facts when the amount of the money collected by the tariff law at the present time will not amount at the best to more than $550,000,000 annually?

We note, however, that he does not say in what period of time this colossal sum is to be paid. If the amount of tariff collected averaged $500,000,000 per year, it would have six years before the sum of $3,000,000,000 would be reached, even if every cent were a tax upon the people. But no, he meant immediately; practically upon the signing of the bill, and that industry would be prostrated.

If manufacturers saw that prices were to rise to such heights as to exact that sum from the consuming public, would they not immediately increase the output of their factories in a wild scramble to get a part of these high profits, and thus by competition produce such a surplus of goods that the saturation point would be speedily reached? What other conclusion can be possible?

What constitutes the complaint at the present time is that the farmer is suffering because he can not get a more profitable price for his products. This in turn presupposes the fact that if there were factories employing more men there would be a greater demand for home consumption of what the farmer produces. Consequently, the farmer would be benefited and the purchasing power of his dollar would be greater, because of the competition among the producers of what the farmer desires in order to gratify his wants or satisfy his needs.

The farmer's trouble at present is that his products are adversely affected by world markets. About 85 per cent of farm products is consumed at home; the balance abroad. It is the 15 per cent exported that fixes the price. Is this not a fair illustration? The price of wheat in London, less freight, is also the price of wheat in New York. Therefore the more we encourage a larger consuming home market by active industrial conditions the more we benefit the farmer. Especially is this so at this time, when the ability of foreign markets to absorb and pay for these products may be seriously in question.

According to a Treasury Department statement as of January 1, 1923, there were in the continental United States, exclusive of our island possessions, 110,560,000 people, an increase over the previous month of 140,000 individuals. This is about the rate at which the population of the United States is growing at the present time. In a year the population increases approximately 1,680,000 persons.

If we divide the total amount of revenue received by the Treasury Department through the customhouses of this country of, let us say, $550,000,000 per year, by 110,000,000 people, we will have $5 per individual as a year's contribution to this amount. This is slightly over 1 cent per day, but certainly less than 10 cents per week. Who will declare that this is too much to pay to protect our home market and endeavor to preserve the high economic level of this country as compared with the economic level elsewhere?

It will be of value for purposes of comparison to mention in this connection the per capita rate of $18 per year, or about 34 cents per week per individual in Canada; £3 19s. in Australia, which is about the same per individual as in Canada; and £2 18s. per year per individual, or 26 cents per week per person in Great Britain, the so-called par excellence free-trade country.

"Less than a dime a week" is the highest possible tax that under these hypothetical conditions could be extracted from each inhabitant in the United States, predicated, of course, upon the assumption of the opponents of protection that the entire burden of the receipts at the customhouses are borne by the people. In reality everyone knows that this is not the case. For the purpose of argument let us assume that only a portion of the $550,000,000 to be collected, say $200,000,000, the increase over what was being collected before the Fordney-McCumber law became operative, is the amount of toll which is extracted from the patient consuming public. Considering it on a family basis, a hasty figuring will show 22,000,000 families in this country on a basis of five to each family.

For the purposes of quick calculation let us consider that there are 25,000,000 of families, and this number being used as a divisor for the $200,000,000 of excess toll obtained would make it $8 per family, or 16 cents per family per week. In the last analysis it comes down to a hypothetical expense of less than 16 cents per family per week if—and the "if" is made large—this additional sum should be taken from the people.

Conceding the premises, where is the fallacy in this argument or in its conclusion?

It is estimated by a competent authority that at least $100,000,000 are collected annually from members of labor unions, and perhaps as much more by those who hold memberships in fraternal or other orders. That sum, if it were divided by the families in the United States, would equal the so-called tariff charge. Where is the individual who would not willingly pay such a tax or who is so poor that he could not afford so to do if by such payment adequate and continuous employment at generous or highly remunerative wages might be had for the asking? Such a condition now exists in our country; all surplus labor of a year ago is employed. The smoke of industry clouds the horizon.

Who desires the atmosphere clarified by the adoption of measures calculated to silence the hum of industry by flooding the market with competitive foreign goods? Certainly such will not be the case under Republican tariff policies. Who ever heard of a protective tariff putting up the shutters on a factory or putting people out of work? Who will be good enough to give an instance of such an occurrence?

Let us review the past and see whether or not the country has financially prospered since the celebration of the country's centennial, so graphically portrayed at the Philadelphia Exposition. The census of 1870 is as near as we can get to that historic date:

When the population was 38,000,000 in 1870 the wealth was $24,000,000,000, or $630 per individual.

When the population was 50,000,000 in 1880 the wealth was $43,000,000,000, or $860 per individual.

When the population was 62,000,000 in 1890 the wealth was $65,000,000,000, or $1,050 per individual.

When the population was 76,000,000 in 1900 the wealth was $88,000,000,000, or $1,160 per individual.

When the population was 81,000,000 in 1904 the wealth was $107,000,000,000, or $1,320 per individual.

When the population was 95,000,000 in 1912 the wealth was $187,000,000,000, or $1,990 per individual.

The figures for 1922 are not available as yet, but if the same rate of progress is conceded during the 10 years from 1912 our national wealth can not be far from $400,000,000,000. This amount is 20 per cent less than the supposed inflation value was in 1920. In arriving at this conclusion inflation and deflation were taken into account, as was also the fact that our national income in 1912 was $33,000,000,000.

If the average profit of industry in general is only 12½ per cent instead of a higher figure, and the income for 1922 is $60,000,000,000, as economists assert it was, we will not be far afield in estimating the national wealth as very close to $500,000,000,000, and that is what, I believe, the census figures will show when they are finally compiled.

In the publication entitled "The Things that Are Caesar's" the wealth of the world from the beginning of time down to 1780, as a surplus of production over consumption in all the thousands of years since time began, is given as approximately only $100,000,000,000.

The wealth of the world to-day is probably one thousand billions of dollars. What is true about some countries having fared badly and others worse, in order to fairly estimate their value to get this grand total, is not in any sense applicable to the United States. Our progress, though temporarily arrested at times, has been fundamentally sound and consistently progressive and enduring.

The reason for this economic advancement was the form of tariff policy in effect. For more than 70 years with few exceptions a protective tariff was in force. Under its beneficial provisions American labor, industry, and commerce enjoyed unrivaled conditions. As a result our citizenship is of a higher standard because of the opportunities our public institutions were able to offer. What has benefited our people socially has in no lesser degree benefited them economically. This is abundantly apparent in the following statement made a few days ago by the American Bankers' Association.

SAVINGS DEPOSITS IN 1922 INCREASE $1,500,000,000.

CHICAGO, February 2 (by Associated Press).—Savings deposits in the United States increased by about $1,500,000,000 in 1922 as compared with 1921, according to preliminary figures tabulated by the savings-bank division of the American Bankers' Association and announced here through district headquarters.

The figures show that, compared to reported savings deposits on June 30, 1921, of $16,818,695,000, the amount for the corresponding date in 1922 was $18,087,493,000.

The number of savings accounts indicated by the partial data in hand was 28,957,526 on June 30, 1922, as compared to 26,637,831 on the corresponding date in 1921, a gain of 2,314,695. For both the amount of savings and the number of depositors later data of States from which complete returns have not yet been received are expected to show larger gains for 1922.

According to this report school savings systems reported deposits of $5,500,000 during the last school year, an increase of 40 per cent over 1921 and 100 per cent over 1920. The number of school systems also increased by over 100 per cent during the last school year and the number of pupils reported as participating was 1,271,000, a growth of 50 per cent over the previous school year.

The data collected by the savings-bank division indicate that life insurance, not including beneficial societies or the Government bureau, now carried on American lives totals more than $50,000,000,000. Premiums on new business during the year ended November 1, 1922, amounted to $225,980,000. The total premiums, including the payments on annuities, paid during the year amounted to more than $1,500,000,000. The amount of new life insurance purchased during the year 1922 was $9,300,000,000, an increase of $600,000,000, or 7 per cent, over 1921.

The Fourth Federal Bank of Cleveland, Ohio, offers additional evidence in the following announcement:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 2.—Business has discarded most of its hesitating attitude—the familiar 1922 trade-mark—and in its place is a spirit of confidence, according to the monthly business review of the Fourth Federal Bank.

"There are good things in store for us in 1923 if we know how to work and look for them," the review states. Aside from the foreign situation, it adds, there is little in the conditions outside of business that will prevent the continuance of good business; should a check develop, it will be due to conditions developed within itself.

In many ways this will be a critical year, the review predicts, a year where effective management, sales effort, better salesmen, more intensive training, and harder and more conscientious work will be necessary.

Many are asking: "Is business going to continue upward during 1923?" the review says, and answers that no one is fully capable of answering, because there are too many unsolved problems.

During the present year business will be good or bad, as we choose to make it, according to the review.

Conditions which might be cited as favorable to continued prosperity, the review states, can be listed as:

- Employment almost universal throughout the country;
 - Industry running at capacity, or nearly so;
 - Money and credit plentiful;
 - Commodity prices firming;
 - Order books filling;
 - Purchasing power of the farmer increasing;
 - Railroads believed to be large buyers of materials as year advances;
 - Large building programs;
 - Retail sales increasing.
- Conditions that might be listed as less favorable are:
- Export situation doubtful;
 - Transportation improving, but only slightly;
 - Fuel situation unsettled;
 - Labor becoming scarce.

The Federal Reserve Board dispels any doubt that may be felt as to the conditions and business outlook in the agricultural implement industry in the following announcement:

[From the Washington Star.]

FARM IMPLEMENTS IN GREAT DEMAND—SALES DOUBLE THOSE OF YEAR AGO—FARMERS IN MUCH BETTER CONDITION.

The Federal Reserve Board last night announced that reports from its country-wide sources indicated evidences of recovery in the agricultural industry from the months of depression, as sales of farm implements in December and January revealed a restoration of the buying powers of the farmers. December sales, according to the reports, were more than double those of December, 1921, and the increases were sustained in January.

The automobile industry may be judged—at least, on one class of cars—by the following announcement:

[Special dispatch to the Star.]

FORD PLANT HAS 25,000 UNFILLED ORDERS FOR CARS.

DETROIT, MICH., February 2.—One of the best indications of to-day's status of the motor industry is the fact that the Ford Co. went into February with more than 25,000 unfilled orders. Ford dealers have requisitions for 148,000 cars and trucks for February delivery, but the production schedule is being held down to 123,000 because of general conditions affecting manufacture.

The supply of labor available at automobile plants has not been so large as manufacturers could have wished, but production has not been notably held back on this account.

Turning to our export trade we find a thriving condition keeping step with domestic activities.

Director Klein, of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, described it in his annual report, on which the following is a news dispatch to the New York Journal of Commerce:

GROWING INTEREST IN EXPORT TRADE—COMMERCE BUREAU ASKS FOR LARGE FORCE—IN ANNUAL REPORT DIRECTOR KLEIN SAYS TRADE INQUIRIES HAVE INCREASED 400 PER CENT IN YEAR—DESCRIBES EXPANSION OF FACILITIES.

[Bureau of The Journal of Commerce.]

WASHINGTON, Dec. 18.—The increased desire of American firms to enter foreign markets with their wares is reflected by a 400 per cent gain in foreign trade inquiries directed to the Department of Commerce this year, as compared with last, Director Julius Klein, of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, declares in his annual report.

Describing the fiscal year 1921-22 as "one of the most crucial periods in the history of the Nation's foreign trade," Director Klein points to the complete reorganization of his bureau under Secretary Hoover's direction as the prime factor enabling it to help American export interests withstand the "inroads of recovering European competition in the world's markets."

Following out the policy of "better service with less meddling," Director Klein says that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce now serves business on a commodity basis through 17 new divisions which specialize on America's great export products of the factories and farms. These divisions are headed by sales experts selected by the trades themselves and guided in their work by about 70 committees composed of business men representing over 150,000 manufacturers and merchants in the leading export industries of the country. This arrangement insures a maximum service to each industry at a minimum outlay of time, labor, and money.

Giving instances of the accomplishments of the bureau in its foreign work, Director Klein says: "The largest Italian contract awarded in years, amounting to $13,000,000, was secured for an American firm through the help of the bureau's office in Rome. The rights of American shippers of goods valued at $68,000,000 to $80,000,000, caught in the port congestion in Cuba, were successfully safeguarded through the aid of the bureau's Habana representative. The Vienna office enabled an American concern to obtain an order for $1,500,000, and the Madrid office saved for American exporters contracts in Spain covering 100,000 tons of wheat."

In concluding his report Director Klein states that if the bureau is to carry on and enlarge its work in the manner dictated by the economic situation of the country, its activities should be extended to cover the study and promotion of domestic commerce. Its foreign service should be strengthened by the establishment of offices in new markets. Experts in commodities not yet specifically provided for, such as tobacco, grain, and many manufactured specialties, should be added to its present staff to meet the increasing demands of the trades. The salaries of many statutory positions should be considerably increased, otherwise the bureau will continue to lose some of its more valuable help.

Further illuminating evidence is furnished in figures compiled in the Department of Commerce and given herewith:

The record would be incomplete without a comprehensive statistical review of business during the last calendar year, which also shows a production record for 11 months with the percentage of increase and decrease fully tabulated:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,

STATISTICAL REVIEW OF BUSINESS IN 1922.

At this time of the year it is customary for business to pause long enough to take account of the progress made during the 12 months just elapsed, and from this standpoint to make some conjectures as to the coming months of the new year. It is with a feeling of satisfaction that most industries can view the progress of the past year in spite of the many difficulties which have been experienced. At the close of 1922 there are no serious obstacles in sight which should hinder further advances during the early part of the new year. The unsettled conditions in foreign countries, particularly in Europe, are still depressing our trade; and, to a certain extent have, no doubt, kept the prices of agricultural products below the level of other commodities. Within the past two months this latter condition has in a measure been relieved.

Production of manufactured commodities in 1922 was about 50 per cent greater than in 1921, according to figures compiled by the Department of Commerce from latest reports to the Bureau of the Census made in connection with the "Survey of current business." Textile mills were about 20 per cent more active than in 1921, the iron and steel industry increased its output from 60 to 70 per cent over 1921; nonferrous metals, from 50 to 95 per cent; petroleum, 15 per cent; coke, 40 per cent; paper, 20 to 30 per cent; rubber, 40 per cent; automobiles, 50 per cent; building construction, 50 per cent; lumber, 35 per cent; brick, 50 per cent; cement, 15 per cent; leather, 20 per cent; sugar, 45 per cent; and meats about 5 per cent. Agricultural receipts were, in general, higher than in 1921. The only declines of outstanding importance were 7 per cent in bituminous coal and 47 per cent in anthracite.

The increase in production and the reduction in immigration improved the labor situation from a large surplus of labor at the end of 1921 to a point where shortages occur, while unemployment has almost been eliminated.

Transportation conditions changed from a huge surplus of idle freight cars to a considerable shortage, while car loadings were 11 per cent greater than in 1921.

Prices to the farmer increased about 17 per cent during the year, wholesale prices advanced 10 per cent, and retail food prices declined

5 per cent. This condition gives the farmer a greater purchasing power and narrows the margin between wholesaler and retailer.

The volume of trade was considerably heavier than in 1921. Sales of mail-order houses increased 6 per cent, and chain stores show a gain of 13 per cent. Debits and bank clearings also show about this same relation.

The following paragraphs compare the statistical data for various industries with the corresponding period of 1921. Usually the comparison covers the first 11 months of each year, but in a few cases figures for only 10 months are available.

TEXTILES.

The wool manufacturing industry was from 20 to 25 per cent more active in 1922 than in 1921. Receipts of wool at Boston for the first 11 months of the year were 21 per cent greater, due to the increase of 42 per cent in domestic receipts. Consumption of wool in mills exceeded last year, on a 10 months' comparison, by 25 per cent. The price of unwashed wool at Boston advanced almost 70 per cent during the year, yarns about 50 per cent, and finished goods advanced about 20 per cent.

Cotton consumption, with its November record since 1917, rose 13.5 per cent in the first 11 months of 1922 over the same period of 1921. Exports of raw cotton declined almost 6 per cent, and stocks were depleted, compared with a year ago, except at mills. The price of raw cotton rose about 12 per cent, both to the producer and on the New York Cotton Exchange, up to December 1, and further advances were made during December. Yarns, print cloths, and sheetings advanced about 20 per cent during the year.

The calculated consumption of raw silk increased 11 per cent over the corresponding 11 months last year. Stocks of raw silk on December 1 were about 150 per cent greater than a year ago. The price of raw silk increased about 10 per cent during the year.

METALS.

The iron and steel industry was from 60 to 70 per cent more active than in 1921, but about 25 per cent less active than in the boom year of 1920. Iron-ore movement was 65 per cent greater than in 1921, pig-iron production increased 60 per cent, and steel-ingot production 71 per cent. Unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation rose about 60 per cent during the year. Iron and steel prices rose from 15 to 50 per cent, with the highest relative increase in pig iron. Exports of iron and steel, based on 10 months' figures, declined 26 per cent.

Locomotive shipments by manufacturers for the first 11 months of 1922 were 16 per cent less than in 1921, owing to the decline of shipments for foreign account of 56 per cent. Domestic shipments increased 8 per cent. Unfilled orders for foreign locomotives on December 1 were less than a year ago, but domestic orders were over ten times as large. Orders for freight cars placed in 11 months of 1922 were over seven times as large as a year ago.

Production of steel sheets averaged about 75 per cent of capacity in 1922, as against 35 per cent in 1921. Sales of fabricated structural steel were about 88 per cent larger in 1922 than in 1921, based on 11 months' figures.

Copper production showed an increase of 96 per cent over 11 months of 1921, but was almost 30 per cent below the 1920 figures. Exports of copper were 29 per cent greater than in 1921, on the basis of 10 months' figures. The price of copper advanced about 10 per cent during the year.

FUELS.

In spite of the strike bituminous-coal production was only 7 per cent less than in 1921 for the 11 months' period, a decrease of 26,000,000 tons. Anthracite coal, however, showed a decline of 47 per cent, with a loss of 40,000,000 tons. Production of beehive coke increased 32 per cent and by-product coke production increased 41 per cent. Public-utility electric power showed an increase of 7 per cent on a 10 months' basis.

The petroleum industry has been about 15 per cent more active than a year ago. Crude petroleum on the basis of 10 months' figures, shows an increase of 16 per cent in production, 9 per cent in consumption, 11 per cent in imports, and 17 per cent in the number of oil wells completed. Shipments from Mexico increased 13 per cent. Stocks on November 1 were 100,000,000 barrels greater than a year ago, an increase of about 60 per cent. The price of crude oil declined about 20 per cent during the year.

The production of gasoline in 10 months increased 18 per cent over the 1921 period, exports increased 11 per cent, and consumption 16 per cent. Stocks on November 1 were about 60 per cent greater than a year ago.

PAPER.

The paper industry showed an increase of from 20 to 30 per cent in activity over 1921. Ten months' figures show an increase of 21 per cent in production of mechanical wood pulp and 34 per cent for chemical pulp. Stocks of mechanical pulp declined about 20 per cent, while chemical stocks increased about 50 per cent.

News-print paper production increased 19 per cent over the 1921 10 months' period, and total stocks increased slightly during the year, though mill stocks declined. Consumption by publishers was 15 per cent heavier than in 1921. Prices declined about 10 per cent. Total production of paper increased 34 per cent, with an increase of 55 per cent in fine paper. Total paper stocks at mills showed little change from a year ago.

RUBBER.

Production of pneumatic tires was 39 per cent ahead of 1921 on 10 months' figures, while inner tubes and solid tires increased 35 and 84 per cent, respectively. Domestic shipments of all three kinds increased from 24 to 35 per cent over last year. Stocks on November 1 were about 30 per cent larger than a year ago, except inner tubes, where the increase was only about half as great relatively. Consumption of rubber by tire manufacturers increased 56 per cent over the corresponding 1921 period. The price of rubber, through a recent rise, is about the same as a year ago.

AUTOMOBILES.

Automobile production made a new high record in 1922—about 50 per cent ahead of the 1921 output as regards passenger vehicles and about 75 per cent in trucks. The truck production was less than in 1919 and 1920, however.

BUILDING CONSTRUCTION.

Total volume of building contracts let in 11 months of 1922 was 52 per cent greater than in the corresponding period of 1921, and for the full year will undoubtedly exceed the 1919 building record. In value the 1922 contracts already exceed the total contracted for in any previous year, and the average number of projects greatly exceed previous years. Over half of the building volume increase over 1921 was due to the increase of over 100,000,000 square feet in residential buildings, or 56 per cent over 1921. The greatest relative increase, however, occurred in industrial buildings, with a gain of 86 per cent, while business buildings gained 48 per cent.

BUILDING MATERIALS.

Total lumber production will exceed the corresponding period of 1921 by about 35 per cent, but for individual species there is a decided variation. The western softwoods, such as Douglas fir, California white pine, and western pine, increased from 50 to 60 per cent over 1921, except redwood, which gained only 20 per cent. North Carolina pine production increased 83 per cent, but southern pine output was only 17 per cent greater than in the 1921 period. Pine and hemlock production in the Lake States showed increases of from 25 to 30 per cent, but hardwood production in that region was less than in 1921.

Production and shipments of flooring increased about 70 per cent in the 11 months' period, and orders gained 50 per cent. The increases were much larger in oak flooring than in maple flooring. Stocks on December 1 were less than a year ago and unfilled orders about 50 per cent greater.

The production of cement in 11 months of 1922 exceeded any previous full year's production and was 15 per cent greater than the corresponding output for 1921. Shipments increased 22 per cent and also made a new high record, exceeding production, and resulting in a decline of about 40 per cent in stocks on hand on December 1.

HIDES AND LEATHER.

Sole leather production, based on 10 months' figures, was slightly less than in 1921, but upper leather production was about 30 per cent greater. Stocks of leather declined during the year, as did also stocks of hides. Exports of leather exceeded 1921, with upper leather exports more than double the previous year. Prices of hides rose from 30 to 50 per cent during the past year, but leather prices tended to decline slightly. Exports of boots and shoes were only a little more than half as large as a year ago, and prices were reduced slightly.

CEREALS.

The final estimate of the 1922 wheat crops shows an increase of 41,000,000 bushels, or about 5 per cent over the 1921 crop, due to the increase in winter wheat. Receipts and shipments of wheat for 11 months were 9 per cent less than in 1921, and the visible supply on December 1 showed a slight decline from last year. Exports of wheat and flour, on 10 months' data, showed a decline of 38 per cent. The production of wheat flour was about the same as a year ago, while consumption increased about 7 per cent. Prices of wheat were slightly higher than a year ago, but flour prices were lower.

The 1922 corn crop shows a decrease of 178,000,000 bushels, or about 6 per cent. Receipts, shipments, and grindings into glucose and starch all increased about 18 per cent over the 11 months of 1921, while the visible supply showed a decline of almost 30 per cent. Exports of corn in 10 months showed an increase of 31 per cent, and the wholesale price increased about 50 per cent.

The oats crop of 1922 was 137,000,000 bushels larger than the 1921 crop, or about 13 per cent. Receipts were about the same as in 1921, but the visible supply was less than half as great. Exports in 10 months were over four times as large as a year ago, and the price increased about 25 per cent.

MEATS AND DAIRY PRODUCTS.

The movement of cattle and calves showed a large increase over 1921, receipts increasing 16 per cent; shipments, 24 per cent; and stocker and feeder shipments, 39 per cent. Slaughter increased about 10 per cent, while exports of beef products declined 9 per cent in 10 months. Cold-storage holdings were about the same as a year ago, and prices in general were higher.

Receipts, shipments, and slaughter of hogs were all about 5 per cent greater than in 11 months of 1921, but stocker and feeder shipments were 18 per cent larger than in 1921. Exports of pork products declined 18 per cent on a 10 months' comparison, and cold-storage holdings increased slightly. The price of hogs was 20 per cent higher than at the end of 1921, while pork prices were about the same as last year.

SUGAR.

Meltings of raw into refined sugar made a new high record in 1922 and were 45 per cent larger than in 1921. Exports of refined sugar also made a new high record and were more than double the 1921 exports. Stocks of raw sugar were slightly smaller than in 1921 at this time and prices of sugar were higher. Receipts in and exports from Cuba were slightly greater than a year ago, but stocks in Cuba on December 1 were only 49,495 tons, as against the huge stocks of 967,515 tons held on December 1, 1921.

WATER TRANSPORTATION.

Panama Canal traffic was 19 per cent larger than last year and made a new high record; traffic in American ships increased 26 per cent. Traffic through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was 25 per cent larger than in 1921.

RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

The average surplus of 282,926 freight cars on December 1, 1921, has almost disappeared, and in its place the average shortage has increased from almost nothing to 133,786 cars. The number of cars in bad order has been considerably reduced during the year. Total car loadings for 1922 increased about 11 per cent over 1921, in spite of the drop in coal loadings, and were almost up to the high mark of 1920. Railroad revenues declined 2 per cent from 1921 on a 10 months' basis, due to a decrease of 1 per cent in freight revenue and 9 per cent in passenger revenue. Operating expenses were reduced by 6 per cent, resulting in a gain of 23 per cent in net operating income.

LABOR.

Employment in factories, as reported from both New York and Wisconsin, showed a gain of about 15 per cent during the year and total pay roll increased about 20 per cent. Estimated unemployment in Pennsylvania was reduced from 269,322 to 28,398 during the year ending December 1. The average applications per job at State and municipal employment agencies show a change from a surplus of 57 per cent in workers to a shortage of 3 per cent.

Immigration and emigration both show declines of about 50 per cent from the corresponding 1921 figures.

PRICE INDEX NUMBERS.

The average price paid to farmers for crops on November 15 was 20 per cent higher than a year ago, and the live-stock price index was about 14 per cent higher.

Wholesale prices have made a gradual rise in 1922, and the index number of the Department of Labor is over 10 per cent greater than a year ago. Farm products and metals had the greatest relative gains. The index numbers of Dun's and Bradstreet's showed larger increases during the year, the former rising 13 per cent and the latter 21 per cent.

The retail food-price index declined 5 per cent during the year and showed about the same relative increase over 1913 as the wholesale food index. The cost of living on December 1, as compiled by the National Industrial Conference Board, was still 3 per cent lower than at the end of 1921. The principal decrease was in food, while fuel and light was 4 per cent higher than a year ago.

DISTRIBUTION MOVEMENT.

Mail-order houses on 11 months' business showed a 6 per cent increase over 1921. Chain-store sales averaged 13 per cent larger than a year ago and were the highest recorded for any year.

Magazine advertising was 6 per cent greater than in 1921, while newspaper advertising, based on 10 months, showed a decline of 6 per cent. Postal receipts for 11 months were 9 per cent greater than in the 1921 period and made a new high record.

PUBLIC FINANCE.

The total United States interest-bearing debt was reduced by $667,000,000 during the 12 months ended December 1, or about 8 per cent; Liberty and Victory loans were reduced by $2,153,000,000, or about 11 per cent. Customs receipts increased 46 per cent and were far greater than in any previous year. Total ordinary receipts of the Government declined 24 per cent and disbursements were reduced by 30 per cent, with a balance of ordinary receipts of over $300,000,000 in 11 months. Per capita money circulation declined slightly during the year.

BANKING AND FINANCE.

Debts and bank clearings for New York City increased 17 and 13 per cent, respectively, while for the rest of the country the increases over 1921 were only 6 and 8 per cent, respectively. Bills discounted by Federal reserve banks were only half as large as a year ago, but investments were twice as great. Note circulation showed little change, but the reserve ratio stood at 76.4 per cent on December 1, 1922, as against 72.7 a year ago. Member banks of the Federal reserve system had slightly smaller loans and discounts outstanding than a year ago, while investments increased by $1,100,000,000 and deposits by $800,000,000. Interest rates fell during the year.

Saving deposits in banks increased uniformly throughout the country by about 5 per cent. Postal savings declined about 10 per cent. Sales of life insurance increased 5 per cent in number of policies and 11 per cent in amount of new insurance.

The number of business failures was 27 per cent larger than in 1921 and exceeds any previous year since 1915. The amount of defaulted liabilities exceeded the huge defaults in 1921 by 5 per cent.

Security prices rose considerably during the year, industrial stocks averaging an increase of about 34 per cent, railroad stocks about 17 per cent, and bonds about 20 per cent. Stock sales were 55 per cent greater than in the 1921 period, and bond sales increased 26 per cent. Liberty-Victory bond sales declined 18 per cent, but other bonds increased in volume by 92 per cent.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE AND TRADE.

The general index of foreign exchange compiled by the Federal Reserve Board increased about 10 per cent during the year, and now stands at 67 per cent of par. The principal changes during the year were the increases in the pound sterling, the Canadian dollar, and the Argentine, Dutch, and Swedish exchanges, and the continued rapid fall in German marks.

Exports were about 16 per cent less than in the 11 months' period of 1921 and the lowest in value since 1915. Imports up to the time the new tariff law went into effect were above the 1921 corresponding period by approximately 16 per cent. Imports of gold declined 62 per cent and exports increased 57 per cent, but an export balance of $21,000,000 still remained for the 11 months of 1922.

This recital of facts indicates a very healthy, prosperous, and growing condition, and, to my mind, is attributable in no small measure to the confidence created by the outlook afforded by the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act. For 134 years, since the first act on July 4, 1789, was enacted, we have enjoyed for the greater part of the time protective tariffs. According to authorities about 62 per cent of the imports in value are on the free list. About 30 per cent more are of a class that are unaffected by such changes in rates that would materially interfere with their free importation, this leaving only 8 per cent upon which the operations of the tariff laws may be conceded to have some effect. Many instances could be cited where this present tariff has received the approval of those who opposed it during its formation and who are being greatly benefited by its operation.

In some remarks I made to the House on July 21, 1921, I advocated the revival of a confident and optimistic spirit in the future of America. That day has already arrived. All industry is girding up its loins in anticipation of the busiest time ever known. The railroads are ordering locomotives and cars in greater numbers than ever before, and already the cry is heard that there are not enough hands to do the work in sight.

Five billions is the amount that is conservatively estimated will be spent by the building industry the coming year, we are assured of no cessation in the work of mining coal, and the network of good roads is like a spider web radiating in all directions.

There is plenty of sunshine visible, and while occasional clouds flit across the sky, yet they are melting one by one, and if we will embrace the golden opportunities that are ours to-day we will not only benefit greatly ourselves but will be a blessing and comfort to those who are for the moment not so fortunate. In the words of Doctor Coué: Every day in every way America is growing better and better.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am in favor of this legislation. My reason for supporting this bill is that I believe that it will materially aid in developing our foreign service. I am of the opinion that our foreign service ought not only to compare with the service of other countries but that it should excel that of any other country. We must take into consideration, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the fact that our foreign commerce has increased and is increasing from year to year. Formerly the Diplomatic Service had very little to do with our foreign commerce, but to-day under the conditions that exist I am satisfied that efficient foreign service will greatly stimulate and aid our foreign commerce. We know that other nations spend tremendously large sums of money to secure the very best and the most capable men to look after their commercial interests. We have been to a certain extent neglectful of our duty in that regard. We ought to have attempted before this time to have made an effort to improve, strengthen, and solidify the service upon which our country must depend not only for its foreign political but commercial affairs as well. I believe this bill goes quite a way in bringing about the greatly needed improvement. It also provides for classification of all in the service, their advancement, and increase in salaries. This provision is absolutely necessary if we desire to keep the experienced and efficient men in this important service. This bill, I am satisfied, will make it possible for young men of poor families, who are capable and aspiring to this service, to continue in the service. Under these provisions we will give the poor lad—the young man who has not income of his own or who can not draw on his parents—the chance and opportunity to obtain the salary that will make it possible for him to exist in his position. I believe we will thereby secure some of the most efficient and most capable young men who up to now have been deprived of an opportunity of seeking this service in foreign lands.

I think this is legislation in the right direction. I am of the opinion that nearly all of us are in favor of bringing an improvement in the service. If there should be anyone in doubt about this bill, I request him to read the evidence by former Ambassador Davis, as was so ably stated by him before the committee. I quote his remarks:

EXTRACTS FROM TESTIMONY OF JOHN W. DAVIS, FORMERLY AMBASSADOR TO GREAT BRITAIN.
(Hearings, 89–92.)

I really do not think that, so far as I know the Government service, there is any one place in it that needs this sort of reform so badly as the Diplomatic and Consular Service, the foreign service, speaking as a whole. Speaking generally, of course, the diplomatic branch of that service is the first line in the country's defense, and the Consular Service is the spearhead of the country's trade.

I have read this bill, and it seems to me it presents four features which, if I may use the phrase, are cardinal points of reform in this question. Manifestly, if we are to get good men in the service, and hold them after they get there, we must set them to work under conditions which are agreeable, that will stimulate their personal ambition, and that will induce them to remain in the service after they have had the experience which makes them valuable. Over and over again, while I was in London, young men and good men in the Diplomatic Service would come to me in great personal concern and ask me frankly whether I thought they ought to stay in the service. I always asked them what their financial condition was.

If I found that they had no—or at best meager—resources beyond their official salary, I told them with great regret that I thought they were doing an injustice to themselves, and that at the earliest opportunity they ought to leave the service and get into something that was not a blind alley. I did that because I felt sure that the time would come when they would want to marry, in the normal course of affairs, and would have children to take care of, and I knew they could not hope to raise a family on the salary they were receiving, and that the time would come, as it comes to all men who stay too long on salaries, when they would find it difficult to get away, and would drag out the rest of their lives in discomfort to themselves and discomfort to their families.

It seemed to me then, and it seems to me now, that if we are to avoid the tremendous "labor turnover" there is in the Diplomatic Service, we must do three things: first, give them an adequate living salary, a salary which will keep them in respectable comfort as long as they are in the service; second, give them a fair chance of promotion. Every man in the service ought to be like Napoleon's foot soldiers, marching with a marshal's baton in his knapsack. They can not all become heads of missions. A great many of them will not become qualified to become heads of missions. That is always true in the nature of things, and I personally believe it would be a great misfortune to the service if the heads of missions should all be taken from the so-called diplomats of career. I think it would be quite contrary to the genius of our institutions and would deprive the President of a field of selection he ought to have; that he should be unable to reach out into the general body of the citizens to make a man ambassador or minister. But there ought to be the incentive, the possibility that an ambassadorship or ministerial position is open to every man who enters the diplomatic career if he has the necessary qualities.

There ought also to be a fair chance of promotion in the lower grades and there ought to be a sufficient number of the lower grades to give him from time to time the stimulus of an advance from one grade to another whenever he has done some creditable piece of work or has shown a fair amount of faculty. We must do something, if men are to be kept working, to stimulate their ambition. In the third place, it is not possible, it seems to me, that the Government will ever be able to pay a salary on which a man can hope to accumulate any reserve fortune. So far as I know there is no post in the whole Government that gives a man much chance to save and probably never will be. The Government will never be able to compete with private enterprise in that respect, and that being true, if the Government expects a man to give his life to the service to take up a presumably fixed career, you must take away from him the fear of a dependent and penniless old age. You must give to these men the same prospect of retirement that you give to the Army and Navy and to the permanent civil service of the executive departments.

Granted adequate pay or reasonable pay, granted a reasonable chance for promotion, as a recognition of merit, and then granted a retirement allowance which will enable a man when he is no longer useful to be assured against want, you will not only get good men but you will be able to retain them because the foreign service does offer, of course, a great many things that are attractive. It is highly intellectual labor. A man who really enjoys intellectual labor can find in the Diplomatic and Consular Service all the field that he needs. It is interesting because it is constantly taking him into new phases of work and there is a certain element of pride about it because it is a dignified position to stand among foreigners as representing a dignified and powerful Nation. This consideration will draw men to the service and will hold them there if they are given a fair chance to live the sort of life that they should live and at the same time make a provision for their old age. I read all these three things in this bill and read them with great satisfaction.

Mr. Chairman, I am for economy. I do not desire to vote a cent of our money where it will not be properly expended. But I do believe that the amount that will be required to take care of these advances in this bill for this very important service will not be so great.

I am under the impression, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that the foreign service is self-sustaining. Two years ago we passed a bill increasing the visé fees from $1 to $10, and it is bringing to the Treasury a large sum of money—I believe a larger sum than that which will be required to take care of the increase in the salaries provided in this bill.

Up to now I think it has been stated by others that it has been rather hard to get young men, unless they came from rich families, to accept a position in our foreign service.

Ambassador Davis sets forth the reasons why this legislation should be enacted, and I am satisfied that he is right. I also desire to call attention to extracts from the letter of Secretary Hughes, wherein he expresses his views in favor of the passage of the bill:

LETTER OF SECRETARY HUGHES TO AUTHOR OF BILL.
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 13, 1922.

The diplomatic service is greatly underpaid. It is well known that a man without private means, whatever his ability, can not accept the more important posts of ambassador or minister, but of more immediate importance is the fact that the salaries of secretaries in the diplomatic service are so low that the choice of candidates is largely restricted to young men of wealthy families who are able and willing to a considerable extent to pay their own way.

It follows that there must be an increase in the salaries of diplomatic secretaries as a means of broadening the field of selection by eliminating the necessity for private incomes and permitting the relative merits of candidates to be adjudged on the basis of ability alone.

Furthermore, if young men of the greatest ability and intellectual ambition are to be attracted to the service there must be the prospect of career, recognition, and distinction; in other words, they must feel that conspicuous ability and fidelity will be rewarded by promotion to the higher grades. The classification of ministers as proposed in H. R. 10213, to which reference has already been made, would be most helpful in this regard.

The Consular Service, on the other hand, while better paid, suffers from great limitations as a public career. There is no prospect of promotion beyond the Consular Service, and it is with difficulty that many of the best men are retained because of tempting offers constantly made to them by the business world.

There would be two distinct advantages to be realized from an amalgamation of the two services on an interchangeable basis: First, those highly desirable benefits of economy and efficiency which would accrue through a system of combined administration; second, a more effective coordination of the political and the economic branches of the service.

It is not my desire to take up any more time of the House, because I believe we are all in favor of this legislation. I yield back the balance of my time, and I ask, Mr. Chairman, permission to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and I am largely in favor of it because it amalgamates the two services which heretofore have been and are now absolutely separate. This gives a young man desiring to enter the foreign service a chance to do so whether he has an income of his own or not. It provides him a sufficient salary wherewith to live. At the present time, with salaries of secretaries in the diplomatic service ranging from $2,500 to $4,000 a year, a young man can not stay in that service and comply with the requirements thereof. He must leave the service after a certain time in order to make a living, and, therefore, the turnover in the diplomatic service is tremendous and extremely injurious to the service and to the country. Just as soon as men are trained for the work they find the salaries are too small to make it a life work, a life career, and retire from the service. Under this foreign service bill a man can go in and be placed in the consular service perhaps as a minor clerk. He would get an experience; he would become qualified in business matters; he would become qualified in dealing with foreign people, and after a while, when qualified, will be promoted, and eventually, perhaps, if showing great fitness, will go into the diplomatic service. Young men in this way can start on the lower rungs of the ladder and continue until they reach the top; so that it gives everybody a chance whether he is provided with large means or not.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman spoke of employees in the department going out into private business. Is it not the case that generally it is not so much the individual that the companies who employ them are after as it is the man who has had this training which the Government has made it possible for the man to acquire?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Very largely, because he has had the training. That is why the private business man wants to get him into his business, but the reason the man leaves the service is because the salary is not sufficient to maintain himself and his family, whereas the salary offered by the individual firm does. Just the other day I had a young man particularly fitted for the consular service, but was told that he could not enter the service because he was a married man. Upon inquiry I found that the salary was so small that the consular bureau could not employ married men to go into that particular service. The salary was not sufficient to maintain a man and his wife. Shall our Government be a party to a service which compels celibacy?

Mr. TOWNER. While it is true that men do go from the civil service because of special qualifications which they acquire in the service, it is also true that it is an immense loss to the Government to lose such skilled service, because a new man can not go into the service with special adaptation for the work equal to that of the man whom we lose. We ought to do everything we can within reason to keep those who are really qualified in the service.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman is entirely right about that. The Government loses all that valuable training which the young man has received. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] awhile ago said that perhaps we ought to have some school to teach young men in the foreign service. I think the best school will be provided under this bill, because it will make it possible to appoint young men to consular positions and in the Diplomatic Service under very able, experienced consuls and diplomats; under that leadership. Under the tutelage of such men of experience at the head of the Diplomatic and Consular Service they will get exceptionally good training and active experience and become proficient and capable of carrying on the work. They will become highly qualified through actual work and experience.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I agree with the gentleman that if this bill becomes a law and young men are admitted to the service under its provisions they will in the consulates and legations get the practical experience of the trained men, but I think a great deal would be added if we maintained a school where we could teach the theoretical side as well, where they could get instruction in economic and other technical subjects which they must know both practically and theoretically if they are to function to the best advantage of the Government as consular officers or as diplomatic officers.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no objection to a proper training of these young men before they enter the service, but the gentleman must realize that men who enter the service are compelled to pass an examination which must show a large degree of fitness and aptitude in the beginning and before appointment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On account of other engagements, I have not been able to follow the debate on this bill. Some criticism was formerly made of the duplication of work on the part of the commercial attachés and the consular agents. Does this bill undertake to take cognizance of that consideration in any degree?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It does not; and I am sorry to say that it does not, because I, too, think there is great duplication of work in the Consular Service and the Department of Commerce commercial attachés. Personally I can see no reason for these commercial attachés, and I think they ought to be done away with and their work covered into the Consular Service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was that phase of the matter given attention by the committee in framing this bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; it was not before our committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much is the approximate increase in the cost to the Government for this consolidation?

Mr. LINTHICUM. This consolidation will cost the Government $578,000 additional in salaries, from which you deduct the $200,000 known as the post allowance, which will be discontinued, and also deduct $50,000 which is applied to the retirement feature, leaving a net additional cost to the Government of $328,000 that is the correct increase. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has raised considerable objection to this bill because he says they all should be placed in one class. That might be true, if Congress would agree to appropriate the higher salaries for every man in the Consular Service. Such has been possible ever since 1915, when the salary class bill was passed. In 1915 Congress passed an act by which it specified the salaries for certain classes of consuls, and ever since that time all could have been placed in one class, but I know the Committee on Appropriations would not appropriate for such a catastrophe, and I am quite sure this House would not ratify any bill which would tend to that end.

I am particularly anxious about the passage of this bill and want to see it become a law because this amalgamation of the Diplomatic and Consular Service will rectify the present uncalled-for social feature.

I believe that if these young men starting in the Consular Service know they can be transferred to the Diplomatic Service, or if a secretary in the Diplomatic Service knows that he can be transferred to the Consular Service, that the cleavage between them will not exist and their social position and prestige equalled.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield right there for a question. There is to an extent probably just as much social aspect and prestige in the Consular Service as there is in the Diplomatic Service—that is, so far as the officers are concerned—is there not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not exactly understand; in what respect?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, probably 60 per cent of the function of our Consular Service is social in foreign offices.

Mr. LINTHICUM. In the Consular Service?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I should say very little is social in the Consular Service. The Diplomatic Service are compelled to reciprocate for attentions paid, but the Consular Service is not on the same social footing at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose the gentleman visits some point where we have a consular office. He has no business in the world at that office. He goes there to pay his respects to our consular agent; and there are certain social responsibilities resting on the consular agent to pay some attention to the gentleman, is there not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I should think if he did not pay some attention he would be rather disrespectful to me.

Mr. BLANTON. But, after all, there is a certain amount of social responsibility.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Of course, there is a certain amount of it, and that is one reason why they require more salary than general employees. Now, on this same question—

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. FESS. Is not the true explanation there that it was not made by our own people, but the standard set up by other countries has made it impossible for a man without money to accept an appointment, and therefore we are retrograding to a point where those gentlemen who will give more attention to social matters than anything else are filling the appointments. Is not that our own mistake there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Absolutely so. The question of the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Ohio can be best answered by the statement on page 15 of the report by our very distinguished ex-Ambassador John W. Davis to the Court of St. James, who practically spent his fortune trying to carry out the will of the people of the United States and trying to keep up his end; and even during war times, when social affairs were very scarce, he spent practically his entire fortune in London. Now, there are certain social features which we must adhere to. I am not strong on the social features myself, I admit; but I think everybody here will admit that if we send a representative to the Court of St. James or anywhere else in the world he must keep up his end of social affairs if he wants to accomplish anything.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. FESS. Suppose he should decline to do it. What would be the effect upon our own country?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I do not know whether there would be any real effect upon our country, inasmuch as we are a very strong and powerful nation and the creditor nation of the world, so perhaps there would not be any direct results; but when he went to accomplish something and found that he was talking to a man he had never met, he would not be able to accomplish the same degree of work or result as if he could speak to him on the basis of having met him on various occasions and having discussed matters socially; and the gentleman from Ohio knows the advantage of being able to go up to a man and shake hands with him over the disadvantage of not knowing him and having to be introduced to him. Even a book agent when he comes into your office now brings somebody with him to introduce him.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit me to read three lines from Page's Life?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. It reads:

Dingy with 29 years of filth and dirt and utterly undignified, I did not understand then and I do not understand now how Lowell, Bayard, Phelps, Hay, Choate, and Reid endured that cheap hole.

Referring to our ambassador's quarters in London. That is Mr. Page writing.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, he who was quite a professor, I dare say that his school is better known by its graduates throughout the country than the people know the school itself. In other words, a young man who graduates from a school and goes into the community and makes a splendid record, the whole community thinks his school must be a very fine school; and just so with the diplomatic agents who go from this country into foreign service and they make a splendid impression—why, the people judge the country very largely by its representatives. I want to say something about this retirement feature, of which I am also in favor, because what I want, and what I believe is the aspiration of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], is to promote a foreign service which will continue and in which men will enter for life work, enter on the lower rung, if it be necessary, and continue in there until their day of usefulness has perhaps expired, and every year they put into the service they become more valuable to this country, just as I believe that every year a man has been in Congress he becomes more valuable not only to his country but to his district and to his people.

And just so it is in the foreign service. If we can once establish a system whereby men can make this their life work and enter into it with that intention and continue in it with that intention, we shall have accomplished a great work in constructive legislation. As it is now, if a man is sent to some foreign country and spends a great deal of time there, it is almost impossible for him, with the salary he receives, to save anything; and as a usual thing he comes back much poorer than when he went, unless he has a private income to draw upon. Therefore I am in favor of this retirement feature, because under it a man can go out and perform his life work, as I have said, and at the end he knows that his country will look out for him in case of sickness, or in case his age limit retires him he knows that he will be taken care of.

It is my opinion that one of the greatest works in constructive legislation that this Congress has done in many years is the enactment of the retirement bill for civil employees. We have practiced it in the Army for a good many years, and we have practiced it in the Navy, also in our courts. Great corporations have adopted it. Only in the last few years has this Congress seen fit to provide the retirement feature for its employees. I believe that when these men who go into foreign countries, many of whom go into regions that are not healthy and many of whom travel long distances, all those things not only prevent them from saving money and laying up money for the days when they shall become old and can not work, but they are also a great drain upon their physical powers and endurance. So I believe that this retirement feature is going to be a great asset in the foreign service, and I sincerely hope that this committee will see it in the same way. It will not take one dollar from the Treasury, except the $50,000 at the present time to establish the working machinery. After that working machinery has been established it will not cost the Government anything for the next 20 years.

It seems to me that a service which is now practically self-supporting will, in 20 years from now, likewise be able to support the retirement feature without cost to the Government. I do not believe when the time comes 20 years from now, if the foreign service grows just half as rapidly and remunerative in the next 20 years as it has grown in the last five years, it will not require one dollar of appropriation by this Congress; I believe, as I say, that we shall have accomplished a great thing and placed these men whom we send to all parts of the world on a basis where they will know that they will be taken care of.

Now, gentlemen, I do not want to take up any more of the time of the committee. I feel very earnest in my support of this bill. It is a great constructive piece of work. It is a piece of constructive work about which we have been talking in the committee for several years. And when the bill is passed and put on the statute books and the foreign service established in accordance therewith, I believe every member of this committee will see that it is a wonderful piece of legislation of which we shall all be proud, and of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] will have reason to be particularly proud. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of this committee has been very frank with us. He has convinced me that no matter what kind of a fight we put up against this bill, he is, nevertheless, going to pass it. He has enough votes to pass it, by 3 or 4 or 5 to 1. So, whenever I am up against a stone-wall proposition like this, I am not going to but my head up against it uselessly. We have 38 Members here present, considering a bill that increases the salaries of our foreign service in the aggregate $528,000 a year. We have a retirement feature here which my colleague on the committee [Mr. CONNALLY of Texas] says is going to cost $500,000 more. Then there are provisions in this bill in addition to pay of all the traveling expenses, increasing the allowance for their daily subsistence from $5 to $8 a day. There is that increase additional.

If by doing so I could stop passage of this bill I would force debate—and I could force it under the rules—I would force debate after every section of this bill is read under the five-minute rule. I would force you to keep a quorum here every moment of the day, if it would stop the passage of this bill, because I am for economy beyond mere lip service, beyond merely preaching economy here on the floor.

I hope the bill will not be passed. I have just one hope for the people of this country as to this measure, and that is that when this bill goes to the Senate it will die in the pigeon-holes there at the close of this Congress. That is my only hope of preventing this increase of expenses to the extent at least of $900,000 a year on the taxpayers of the land.

I wish all the Members of the House could know just what this bill does. I wish they could be here and vote the sentiment of the people in their districts. But unfortunately they are not here. However, I am not going to punish them by demanding roll calls every five minutes.

I am not surprised at the Committee on Foreign Affairs allowing a bill like this to go by. Here is the situation: Whenever you have a big diplomatic social function in Washington they have to attend, and they have to touch elbows with the leaders in this foreign service. They become intimately acquainted with them.

When they go abroad they are treated like lords of the land. They become close, fast friends of the entire service. They naturally feel interested in them. When my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] goes abroad and is entertained over there at these big social functions and walks in ahead of big generals and admirals it makes him feel that up here, not only in Massachusetts but elsewhere in the United States, there should be nine rungs on the social ladder of distinction, nine different rungs of distinction that shall divide the social castes of American citizens. I am not surprised at this coming from the great old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, but I can not stop the bill, and, as I said before, I have got to sit down here and watch it pass.

Mr. PORTER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to know how much time is remaining to this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take up the time of the committee, but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on certain phases of the work of the Coal Commission. You know that commission is trying to figure out some plan whereby coal will cost less to the consumer. I should like to extend my remarks on that subject and perhaps incorporate in my remarks certain excerpts or papers from men who happen to know something of that subject. I want to be frank with the committee and to state my exact purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the coal inquiry, with the privilege of inserting certain excerpts if he cares so to do. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Chairman, by virtue of the authority granted me by the House I desire to place in the RECORD a statement addressed to the United States Coal Commission, prepared by Col. William D. Ord, of Landgraff, McDowell County, W. Va., who is chairman of the joint committee of seven associations of coal operators engaged in the mining and shipping of coal from southern West Virginia, all of which, excepting the New River Association, are located within the district I represent. Of the many splendid, patriotic men engaged in the coal industry in the region covered by my district, Colonel Ord ranks among the foremost. I cordially invite Members of the House and all those who are interested in the solution of the coal problem to read Colonel Ord's statement. It is informative and at the same time very entertaining. But few men within my acquaintance are better qualified to elaborate upon the coal proposition in West Virginia than Colonel Ord. His statement follows:

UNITED STATES COAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: These operators of West Virginia have no proper place before your board. Our own labor difficulties have never deprived the people of their coal; rather we have always supplied the Nation when there were labor disturbances elsewhere. Our mines are not overdeveloped; instead, we must constantly expand them to meet the demand for our coal. Our business is not seasonal; on the contrary, we have the central west throughout the year, and the Lake trade to serve in summer, the industries of the East and New England to support, and a foreign commerce to sustain, all of which keeps us constantly engaged. Our prices, as a whole, have created no scandal; rather we have always joined hands with the Government in every effort to control the whole market in the interest of the public. And on only rare occasions—and then due to outside influences—have our transportation difficulties risen to the dignity of a public menace. On these accounts we do not belong in the throng which crowds your anteroom to explain their misdeeds.

And yet we men of West Virginia are here. You have drawn us in. The public will not be satisfied unless we appear. We have come therefore, and gladly, to say this one thing and to prove it:

West Virginia's difficulties have all been imported. They were carried into our borders. And they originate in the fact that others having fallen into a quagmire are and have been trying to drag us in with them.

That this may be apparent we recite our simple story from the beginning.

The coal bearing part of southern West Virginia is extremely mountainous and rough; a country of deep and narrow mountain gorges which afford the only low level routes through which the railroads and the public roads can be driven. Only three practical passageways across the State from the seaboard to the Ohio River Valley are available. Because of the mountain peaks direct rail communication between the north and south portions is so difficult as to be next to impossible. There is little level ground.

In these gorges the coal veins outcrop. Here is found the coal of the greatest variety and of the best quality in any district of similar size in the world.

At the eastern outlet of these gorges is the port of Norfolk, the gateway to the commerce of New England and the world. At the western end of these gorges begins the great coal-consuming district of the Middle West.

The people in both directions from these mines have come to depend upon this assortment of coal. Three great railway systems were built on and sustained by the commerce which these mines create.

Prior to the opening up of the mines the country generally was an almost unbroken forest, practically none of it was or is fit for agriculture. Towns and even hamlets were small and few because there was nothing to sustain community life. The tide of emigration seeking the fertile plains to the west flowed around this barren mountain section. Those who eked out an existence there were descendants, generally speaking, of the trappers and hunters who made our post-colonial days romantic with their pioneer spirit.

With the advent of the coal operator in this region came the modern community life. Coal mining demands labor in quantity. None being available the operator had to carry his workmen with him. He had to provide for them all the creature comforts—houses, food, clothing, water supply, light, medical attention, sanitation, and later roads, schools, churches, recreation, and amusement.

The uncertainties of any new commercial venture accompanied these early mining operations. In addition, the pioneers were under the handicap of having to try to introduce an unknown coal to patrons already supplied. For years they struggled for existence. The operator and his employee ventured together into this field. There was hope, but hardly that either would there establish a permanent home. Even with land available few cared to make investment in homes. For this reason the residences of officers and employees alike were constructed by the mining companies as parts of the plants. This practice remains.

Under these conditions the railroads, the mining industry, and the communities grew together.

Of the group of mines here represented the New River Coal Field was first developed. Then followed Pocahontas in 1880, and the Tug River, Thacker, Logan, and Winding Gulf fields at much later dates.

The close contact inspired by a common risk and a primitive life brought naturally an intimate and friendly relationship between owners and employees such as arises between captain and crew of a ship in peril from a storm. This relationship has always existed, exists to-day, and will continue to exist unless ruptured—as has frequently been threatened—by outside influences. Many of the employees of former days are the employers of to-day; relations entered into in these fields are enduring.

This relationship developed into community action. Prior to the development of the coal mines school facilities were of the most primitive type; the teachers were poorly qualified and poorly paid, while the school terms lasted but two or three months a year. In their places to-day are up-to-date school buildings which compare favorably with similar institutions of larger towns. The teachers are well educated and well trained; in most instances they are graduates of normal schools. Their salaries are as large as those paid in many cities, and quite frequently their services are obtained in competition with the larger communities.

With the development of this community spirit came frequent meetings of a public, semipublic, and social nature for the promotion of the common welfare. All communities have their churches around which center many of these activities. These churches were erected and are maintained by joint contributions of employers and employees.

Again the same community spirit inspired modern roads built with money raised by bond issues directed by popular vote. So large a proportion of the employees own their automobiles that finding suitable ground for garages is difficult. Their children are carried to school in motor busses operated at public expense.

In addition to assuming their share of expense for community development, each coal company provides competent physicians whose services, including medicines, are furnished the employees at a small fixed charge—usually $2 per month per family. Many of the companies provide at their own expense, without any charge whatever to employees, trained and certified nurses and adequate emergency hospital facilities at the mines.

House rents are usually based on a charge of $2 per room per month. Electric power and lights are furnished at prices less than half the rates paid in cities. Employees are permitted to use all the coal they want for culinary and heating purposes, for which a small fixed charge is made, usually about $1 per month per family.

These items entail a heavy fixed charge upon the coal companies, for which the only compensation is satisfied and contented employees.

The necessities from the beginning have demanded that the companies maintain stores. In these the prices of food, clothing, and other necessities of life are so low as to call forth protests and criticism from independent stores in neighboring small towns and to induce customers from the larger towns frequently to go considerable distances to patronize these company stores.

Athletics, including baseball, football, and other outdoor sports, play an important part in the life of these communities. Athletic grounds exist practically everywhere, and local and interplant contests frequently occur. Other recreation facilities include moving-picture theaters and other indoor entertainments.

We have gone fully into these details not to boast but to depict the spirit which has grown because employers and employees sustained the proper relations to one another. We have had from the beginning the spirit which great corporations everywhere are trying to build by all the arts of modern welfare work. Because of it, we employers and employees found, together, a wilderness and caused it to blossom into an advanced community.

Up to this point we have shown our relations among ourselves. We begin here to show what our relations have been to the rest of the country—what our internal accord has meant to the national community.

In her natal year, 1863, West Virginia began to contribute to the bituminous coal needs of the Nation. She produced that year 4½ per cent of the total national consumption. The increase in production thereafter was naturally slow, owing to the difficulties and handicaps heretofore described. It was not until the coal fields, heretofore mentioned, began to be developed that its percentage of production materially increased. But in 1889 the State produced 6½ per cent of the bituminous coal of the country, and by 1915 had made such progress that it produced 17.4 per cent of the Nation's coal. In tonnages West Virginia produced, in 1863, 444,648 tons; in 1889, 19,252,995 tons; in 1915, 77,184,069 tons; and in 1918, 89,935,839 tons.

Beginning shortly after the Civil War and down to 1915, with certain temporary exceptions, the average price of West Virginia coal seldom, if ever, varied more than 25 per cent. That is to say, from the time when West Virginia coal first entered the market until the Great War in Europe, fluctuation in the price of this coal was small and unimportant.

When in 1916 it became evident that this country would become involved in the Great War—a year previously it had become involved in it in an economic way—bituminous coal became of the first importance. By reason of the excessive demand for it by the manufacturers who were struggling to fill war orders from Europe as well as America, and by reason of the growing shortage of railroad transportation and the inability of the carriers to purchase equipment for prompt delivery, all the coal which was needed could not be supplied. Therefore the price was forced, by urgent buyers, to unheard of heights.

Our country's entry into the Great War in 1917 brought the coal industry under Government control. With it came the incessant demand from the United Mine Workers of America for increased wage scales. The granting of these demands; the increased wages conceded to other unions by manufacturers who furnish the materials used at the mines; the consequent increase in railroad rates; and the increases in vessel rates, so increased the prices of coal that our American customers were, and have been, compelled to pay from two to three times the former price for coal. They can not understand it. Nor will they be satisfied until prices are deflated, not only on coal at the mines but of the railroad rates and all other distribution charges accruing between the mine price and the consumer's door.

Deflation did start in promptly on Armistice Day, November 11, 1918. It became apparent to buyers early in 1919. The downward trend was halted sharply in the fall of 1919, when the United Mine Workers of America—demanding an increase rather than a decrease in wages—called a general strike, which after six weeks again increased the price of coal. Doctor Garfield, then United States Fuel Administrator, insisted that the United Mine Workers Union modify its demands. It refused. And it succeeded in securing a substantial increase effective November 1, 1919. It won a still greater increase August 16, 1920, through the United States Bituminous Coal Commission appointed by the President.

Peace restored, after the 1919 strike, the law of supply and demand began to assert itself in 1920. The tendency toward lower prices was short-lived. The outlaw strike of the railroads came in April. Terminal congestions and a stoppage of coal movement resulted. Public officials and the newspapers became alarmed and incited panic among the people. And at the critical time Europe, to save itself from Bolshevism which was sweeping into western Europe from Russia, where it was finding a ready foothold because the factories were idle from lack of coal, began to plead with American producers for coal. We did not have the coal to spare, but our public officials were convinced that the peace of the world depended upon our getting coal to Europe, and we did it. At this critical time the gambling middlemen, at home and abroad, descended upon this distressing situation and created panic and prices which have shamed the industry.

This wild demand began to slacken in November, 1920. Early in 1921 it had entirely passed. Then again the inexorable law of supply and demand commenced to work. Again deflation started. And for the first time since 1916 prices went back to low levels and in many instances greatly below the then cost of production.

Again the United Mine Workers of America, unalterably opposed to doing its share in this deflation, called a strike effective April 1, 1922, with the result known to all.

After the nation-wide strike of 1922 was called and after it became apparent that a runaway market was inevitable, Secretary Hoover appealed to the nonunion operators, on May 15, 1922, to increase production to the uttermost and voluntarily to keep the price of coal on a fair basis. Several conferences were held at Washington, at all of which the nonunion operators showed a willing inclination and intention to comply with the request as made. What was known as "fair prices" were established at Mr. Hoover's request and were approved by him. These prices were generally maintained and adhered to, by the smokeless operators so thoroughly as to receive the hearty commendation of the Secretary of Commerce. Notwithstanding these facts, a distinguished United States Senator, on the floor of the Senate, made a severe attack on the coal industry, accusing those engaged in it of profiteering. In response to that attack and in response to a letter, Mr. Hoover, on August 18, 1922, addressed a letter to the Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH setting forth the facts as to the fixing of the prices of coal. In that letter he states:

"Through these arrangements approximately 70 per cent of the coal is moving to-day from the mines on a fair-price basis. * * * I inclose, for example, a statement showing the coal sold under the fair price in the smokeless fields as compared with profiteer coal from those districts."

That statement is as follows:

SHIPMENTS FROM POCAHONTAS FIELD—

West Virginia, showing entire product and amount thereof sold during June, July, and to August 15, at or below and above the fair price:

	Tons.
June: At and below fair price.....	1,981,776
July: At and below fair price.....	1,225,930
Over fair price.....	50,370
To August 15: At and below fair price.....	708,215
Over fair price.....	25,185

President Harding made the coal situation, in connection with the strike of 1922, the subject of a message to Congress on August 18, 1922. After discussing the various efforts made to settle the strike and their failure by reason of the defiance by the United Mine Workers of America of all sense of obligation to the public and to the Government, the President says:

"The simple but significant truth was revealed that, except for such coal as comes from the districts worked by the nonorganized miners, the country is at the mercy of the United Mine Workers."

We have now shown our relations and their fruits. We have produced coal in season and out of season. We have received modest prices, except when a world upheaval created conditions beyond our control. Our record is that as soon as an abnormal situation disappeared, the normal tendency asserted itself and prices declined. We now come to a new set of conditions which were imposed upon us from without and for reasons which we will recite.

From the beginning of the coal industry in West Virginia it has been the policy of the operators to conduct the business on a non-union basis. This policy on the part of the operators is shared by a great number, if not all, of their employees, many of whom frankly state they will not work under the union; they will abandon mining rather than do so and will seek other occupations. Notwithstanding the legal right of the operator and the miner to agree upon terms of employment satisfactory to themselves, we have for a generation been interfered with almost without cessation in every way the United Mine Workers of America could devise to accomplish the conquest of our State. They have employed all means from noisy oratory and false representations in private and in public to leading armed groups numbering many thousands of men across the State in open defiance of the State and Nation. Let us give you a brief outline of the history of the United Mine Workers of America's conspiracy to conquer West Virginia and its consequences.

The initial conspiracy had its origin in a contract entered into at a joint conference between the miners and operators of the central competitive field in Chicago, January 17-28, 1898. From that contract we quote the eighth clause, which is as follows:

"That the United Mine Workers' Organization, a Party to This Contract, Do Hereby Further Agree to Afford All Possible Protection to the Trade and the Other Parties Hereto Against Any Unfair Competition Resulting from the Failure to Maintain Scale Rates." (See hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor, United States Senate, Senate Resolution 80, p. 394.)

The true meaning of the clause just quoted, as understood by the parties thereto, appears in the minutes of the various joint conferences held after that time, from which we give only three excerpts out of many which might be given.

At the conference held in Pittsburgh, January 18, 1899, John Mitchell, national president of the United Mine Workers of America, said:

"I want to say to the operators that an effort has been made in the past year to curtail the West Virginia coal by preventing its sale on the market." (See hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor, United States Senate, Senate Resolution 80, p. 395.)

At the same meeting Mr. Batchford, whose term of office as president of that organization had just expired, said:

"I want to make a proposition here—That the interest of the West Virginia miners, by reason of the efforts of our organization, have been hampered and injured more in the past year than in any year since they have been operating in the State of West Virginia." (See minutes of joint conference of January 17-24, 1899.)

At the joint conference of 1902 John Mitchell, then president of said organization, further said:

*"We want the check-off system for several reasons: First, * * * because the Pennsylvania operators come here this year and raise Cain with the miners because they do not organize West Virginia."* (See hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor, United States Senate, Senate Resolution 80, p. 399.)

This "conspiracy" of 1898 was referred to at practically every joint conference from that year forward, as the minutes of said conferences will show. It has been set up and proven in numerous suits in various courts of the country. It has never been denied, and the courts have uniformly held it to exist and that it was unlawful.

That it has continued to the present is shown by the statement made by Mr. Fred Mooney, secretary and treasurer of district No. 17, United Mine Workers of America, and published in the United Mine Workers' Journal of December 1, 1920, from which the following quotation is taken:

*"For the struggle in Mingo County is an economic one. * * * In fact, it is the continuance of a struggle begun in West Virginia some 23 years ago and extending throughout this period."*

The struggle to which he refers is, of course, the struggle to unionize the coal miners of West Virginia which the United Mine Workers of America had promised the operators and miners of the central competitive field to do, in order to raise the cost of production of coal in West Virginia to such a point that it could not compete with the coal produced in the central competitive territory. This was a part of the consideration for the joint wage scale and the check-off which had been granted to the organization by the operators of the central competitive field.

A further effect of the joint agreements in the central competitive field has been to fix the wages of coal miners throughout the United States wherever the union exists and has control, because wages elsewhere have been fixed by the union with relation to the wages in the central competitive field. This control of mine labor by one organization has materially affected the selling price of bituminous coal everywhere.

The United Mine Workers of America is frankly and fully committed to the theory of a monopoly of mine labor in all the coal mines in the United States and has never omitted any act, lawful or unlawful, within its power to bring about that situation.

So tremendous and menacing is its power, by reason of the very large percentage of coal mines in the United States it now dominates, that when it arbitrarily calls a strike, as it did in 1919 and again in 1922, approximately 60 per cent of the coal production of the country stops instantly and nothing except the production of coal in the nonunion fields has saved the country from national calamities.

This enormous and widespread curtailment in production naturally and inevitably results in unduly high prices to the consumer for the coal being produced, because consumers become panic stricken and bid against each other for the available supply. This reduced production and the panic of the buyers are not the only things that then contributed to the high price of coal, for the union, in order to increase the chances of making the strike a success, directed every possible effort and attack against the nonunion fields to hamper and reduce their production, which efforts and attacks had to be resisted, including protection of the rights of nonunion men to work—an expense which increased greatly the cost of production in the nonunion fields. It may fairly be said that except as to the unusual situations heretofore referred to, the high prices of coal during recent years have been the direct result of the actions of the United Mine Workers of America in calling nation-wide strikes, such strikes being made possible by its absolute control of mine labor in such a large part of the country.

Not only does it aim at the absolute control of all mine labor in the United States, but it has further declared its intention to secure a world-wide control. In line with this object, this organization made efforts during the past summer to influence British coal miners to prevent the shipment of any British coal to the United States while this organization was on strike.

The history of the efforts of the united mine workers' organization to organize West Virginia is made up of a series of crimes against persons and property without any parallel, certainly in the United States. Short reference will be given to some of the outstanding acts of violence.

In 1912 the union made a determined effort to organize the Kanawha field. Trouble first broke out on Paint Creek and then spread to Cabin Creek and New River, both being nonunion fields. Martial law was declared on September 2, 1912, and the whole of the State's militia was stationed on the two creeks mentioned. This trouble was made the subject of a very exhaustive investigation by a committee of the United States Senate. The whole issue was whether or not the union would be recognized by the operators. The trouble continued for more than a year, during which time there was a great deal of violence of all kinds, including the shooting up of mines by members of the union.

On November 16, 1917, members of the United Mine Workers of America on strike shot up the town of Glen White, W. Va., under a well-devised and well-carried-out plan, preceded by the purchase of high-power rifles for that purpose. Six of these men were tried and convicted of attempt to commit murder in the first degree, including Toney Stafford, international organizer of the United Mine Workers of America, and Ed. Snyder, president of Glen White local of that organization, each of whom was sentenced to five years in the State penitentiary, the other four pleading guilty and receiving one-year sentences. Three of them were ordered deported by the United States Government on account of their being undesirable aliens. Four others were not prosecuted because they turned State's evidence, and it was upon their testimony chiefly that the above convictions were had. One of the men implicated was never apprehended. It will be observed that this shooting up of the town of Glen White occurred during the war when all patriotic citizens were straining every nerve and energy to supply the fuel needs of the country and had for its direct object the stopping of production of the mine situated there, notwithstanding that a representative of the Federal Government had made an investigation and had decided that the miners were wrong in their contention.

Perhaps the most consistent, persistent, and typical example of the length to which this organization will go to accomplish its purpose is that of Willis Branch, in Fayette County, W. Va. The original difference involved six or eight coal companies and was confined to one issue, namely, the refusal of the companies to enforce the closed union shop (by refusing work to applicants not members of the union) and the check-off, having agreed to the union wage scale and all other conditions imposed by the union. The village of Willis Branch and the mine situated there seemed to have been selected for the violence, to be here described, by reason of the local situation, being in a very isolated position—a village in a narrow valley surrounded by mountains, from the tops of which the village was within rifle range. Beginning in the latter part of the summer of 1919 and ending in the early part of the summer of 1921, this village and mine were subjected to a series of attacks by rifle fire and the burning and dynamiting of buildings. The rifle fire from the mountains recurred at frequent intervals during the whole of the period mentioned, as many as 1,000 shots being fired in single instances. The hoist house near the mine was broken into and the machinery destroyed, putting the mine out of business for several months. About the time it was repaired and the mine ready to start up again the head house was burned down, again putting the mine out of business. Finally, on the 22d of May, 1921, the tippie was saturated with gasoline or kerosene, set on fire, and destroyed, together with many railroad cars belonging to the Virginian Railroad Co. and much trestlework, railroad ties, etc., from which damage the company has never recovered. The superintendent's house was dynamited. The poles on which the power lines were strung were cut down. The head house at the mine was burned. The power house, a stone building, was blown up.

For these Willis Branch outrages Walter Romine, secretary of the local union of the United Mine Workers of America, was tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary for six years. George Barret, international organizer of the United Mine Workers of America, was tried and convicted, after he procured a change of venue, and sent to the penitentiary for six years, where he now is. John Kidd, Lee Donald, and Clarence Donald were also convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary. A large number of other members of the organization have been indicted but have not yet been tried, including Lawrence Dwyer (otherwise known as "Peggy" Dwyer), international executive board member; James Gilmore, who was president of district 29 (in which Willis Branch is located) during a part of the time mentioned; John Sprouse, who was also president of district 29 during a part of this time; and Frank Williams, a member of the district board of district 29. Along with them were indicted George Lafferty and Tom Lewis, alias Tom Canadian, who were not members of the United Mine Workers of America, but who were desperate characters used by the United Mine Workers of America in making these attacks, and their families participated in the relief fund provided by the above union for families of their members.

Another man deserving special mention for his activities in connection with the Willis Branch violence is David Robb, stated in numerous written confessions of members of the union who participated in said violence to have acted as financial agent of the union in supplying guns and ammunition. He afterwards participated in the Mingo violence in the same capacity. His history is said to take him back to the Coronado Coal Co. destruction and to the Colorado strike.

The union also made an effort to organize the miners in Mingo County, W. Va., and the means they adopted were to make night and day attacks on the mining camps and tipples by shooting into them and at the miners who remained at work with high-power rifles and guns of every description. Several tipples were dynamited or burned and a great deal of property was ultimately destroyed and 28 lives lost. Here again the only issue was recognition of the union by the operators.

The armed march on Logan County in 1921 was an effort to intimidate the nonunion miners of Logan County and to forcibly organize them. This march was the most pretentious effort to force unionization on nonunion men that has yet been made. The marchers, estimated to be 10,000 in number, fully armed and equipped with all the arms, ammunition, and supplies necessary to fit out an army, started in Kanawha County in the unionized fields and marched thence 50 miles or more across the country, commandeering arms, supplies, and train en route. They were met on the border of Logan County by the nonunion miners and other supporters of law and order and their march was stopped. The Federal Government soon after that sent United States soldiers to maintain law and order and the marching miners finally were sent home.

Your commission is considering the industry as a whole. From others you have received a recitation of their situations. From us you here received an exposition of our own case. Speaking now as part of the whole industry, we believe you will find all operators and all miners in substantial agreement on the following facts:

The shortage of coal in no period is or has been due to lack of capacity in the mines to produce coal; no one can seriously contend that this is the case. There were in 1910, according to Geological Survey figures, 5,818 mines in the United States, and in 1920, on the same authority, 14,766; an increase in the decade of 154 per cent. During the same period and on the same authority the production of coal in the country in 1910 was 416,000,000 tons and in 1920 was 569,000,000 tons, an increase of only 37 per cent. We think that production and consumption are sufficiently close to one another for figures to be interchangeable for present purposes. The disparity shown above between the 37 per cent increase in consumption and the 154 per cent increase in the number of producing mines is, in our opinion, a complete answer to any suggestion that the mine capacity is insufficient.

If the supply of coal is insufficient after this show of capacity the cause must be sought in some other direction. To assist you in that direction we recite:

Our mines to-day are running at less than 50 per cent capacity. This is due solely to a lack of transportation. We can not supply our market if the railroads can not carry more than half of what we can produce.

As we have shown, every period of shortage, except that caused by the war demand, has been preceded by a strike of the union miners.

This leads us to suggest: Stripped of all nonessentials, the two questions before you are:

(1) How can the periodical interruptions of coal production be stopped?
(2) How can the wild fluctuations of coal prices be brought to an end?

Answering these questions categorically, the interruptions of production can be stopped if you can arrange to prevent, forever, the union from calling a nation-wide strike. In this connection your particular attention is called to the vital distinction in the principals involved between a "local" and a "national" strike. In a "local" strike the effects are confined to the employers and employees directly concerned in a personal or local issue; whereas in a "national" strike the issues are political rather than economic in character, and bring suffering, loss, and disaster to the general public.

The price fluctuations will disappear if and when the great strikes cease and when the railways can carry our coal to market.

Your commission represents the whole people of the United States. If you feel that the consumer should continue to pay present—or higher—prices for coal, the miners' union should be encouraged by new concessions. If you feel that the people are paying prices which are too high, an effective curb should be put upon its activities—by removing exceptions to the anticonspiracy laws and by protecting all American citizens in their right to work unmolested under such conditions as they elect.

NEW RIVER ASSOCIATION,

TUG RIVER COAL OPERATORS ASSOCIATION,
LOGAN COAL OPERATORS ASSOCIATION,
OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION OF WILLIAMSON FIELD,

By WM. D. ORD,

Chairman Joint Committee.

BLUEFIELD, W. VA., P. O. Drawer 868.

Mr. Chairman, the sum and substance of the recommendations of Colonel Ord, one of the highest authorities in the coal business, and speaking for the seven associations of one of the greatest coal regions in the world, is that coal can be made cheap to American consumers and the volume of export coal can be increased if a general strike of coal miners can be obviated. In plain language, the whole proposition can be solved if the United States Coal Commission will recommend and Government departments will carry into execution a plan whereby nation-wide strikes can be prevented. The whole matter is reduced into one problem—how may coal strikes be obviated? If the coal commission will meet with and solve this problem, then it shall have accomplished the purpose for which it was established, and there will flow from its action benefits of immeasurable value. The operators and the men who dig the coal are equally interested in this matter along with the consumer.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there is no warrant, in fact, for my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] suggesting that the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs find their work pretty much altogether of a social character and are affected by social influences in the conclusions which they reach. I doubt whether they more extensively cultivate society than do the gentlemen who serve on the Committee on the District of Columbia, including my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Certainly the Committee on the District of Columbia get into the headlines and stories of the newspapers much more frequently than our committee.

This bill comes to the House after very elaborate consideration, after the committee had heard men who are supposed to be best posted on this particular subject, and omitting no opportunity for those who may be in opposition to be heard.

Many days were taken in listening to a presentation of facts and arguments, and then days were taken in considering carefully the details of the proposed legislation and trying to put the bill in the best possible shape. I do not mean to say for a minute that, because this or that outstanding man appears before a committee and gives his views in favor of or against legislation, the committee for that reason should necessarily fall in with his views and make their report accordingly; but I do mean to say that when such a man as the Secretary of State—who is certainly a man of very great ability and who studies every subject with which he deals—tells the Committee on Foreign Affairs that he deems this measure vitally essential, and when there comes forward later a former ambassador to Great Britain who has had the singular good fortune never to incur any adverse criticism, so far as I know, in any office that he has held, who is a man of superlative talent and very great experience, and adds his commendation to that of the Secretary of State, I think at least any gentleman who entertains doubts should carefully examine the evidence that has been presented. And then Mr. Hughes and Mr. John W. Davis are supported by extremely competent men who have long served in the State Department; men whose record is tinged in no way by partisanship; men who in their years of experience have learned to give the Government the best that is in them.

My strong reason for supporting the bill is this: We are in a world of more severe competition, in respect to diplomatic and economic matters, than any generation of men have probably known. It is no secret that our principal competitor in that regard is Great Britain. Unless this measure, or some similar measure, is passed we will continue in the future, as to a large extent we have been heretofore, at a disadvantage in competition with our principal competitor. Gentlemen talk about this bill as if it concerned only individuals or small groups. But if it be true—and I assume it is true—that by the enactment of this bill we will be placed on a more favorable footing in competition with the other nations of the world, can anybody fix a limit to the benefits which may accrue to the United States by legislation of this character?

The benefits will not be confined to the classes concerned about social functions who are in the mind of my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. They will extend to all the manufacturing interests of America who have or should have business with other nations. They will extend to the farmers of America, who are anxious that our foreign markets shall be widened out, realizing that an enlargement of our foreign markets will perhaps do more for them than all the new credit facilities that can be supplied.

Now, in a word, what do we do by this bill? Nothing novel. The essential principles of the bill are contained in the legislation of 1915 suggested by the former administration and enacted by a Democratic Congress.

Mr. BLACK. Will my friend yield for just one question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. If I recall that fact correctly, it did not provide retirement for the employees of the Diplomatic and Consular Service.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I except the matter of retirement. Save the retirement feature of the bill and, I may say further, the representation-allowance feature of the bill, the principles carried in this bill closely parallel the principles that were carried in the legislation of 1915.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. And the retirement feature has already been accepted and put into practice in the other departments of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire more time?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Just a few minutes more.

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was the design of the legislation of 1915 to detach the diplomatic secretarial service and the Consular Service from party politics, the legislation being in line with regulations theretofore put in effect and observed. That general principle is carried in this bill. It was the theory of the legislation of 1915 that men appointed to the Diplomatic Service below the rank of minister and ambassador might be transferred from post to post by the President at will. And the same thing was the theory with respect to the Consular Service.

Now, what does this bill do? It does not amalgamate the two services, but it facilitates the transfer of a man from one field of service to the other field of service, and, in the way which the gentleman from Massachusetts has explained, produces a flexibility which does not exist at this time. In other words, it says to a young man, "Come into the foreign service; you may be employed two or three years as a consul or a diplomatic secretary, and then have the opportunity of entering the other branch." That is something that will stimulate the ambition and hope of the young men who have an inclination to serve the Government in foreign countries.

Now, that can not be done, as gentlemen have explained, without readjusting salaries, because, as they have explained, if there is to be no readjustment of the salaries a man might be serving to-day in a consular office and transferred to-morrow to a diplomatic post of no greater importance and dignity at a very much lower salary. There has got to be a consolidation, so to speak, of the salaries in order to bring about in a practical way the flexibility that is desirable. Now, in respect to that, we are only doing what I understand Great Britain has done for a long time. In providing for increase of salaries, assuming that the number of men in our foreign service will not be increased, the annual increase of salaries will be $328,000 distributed among about 600 men—not a large per capita increase. In making the increase of salaries we have not gone as far in fixing the totals as Great Britain has gone.

I have had some hesitation about the retirement provision, but when I came to reflect that a similar provision is carried in what we know as the Lehlbach bill, applying to the civil-service employees of the Government; that for years and years it has been recognized as a proper thing to apply such a provision to the Army and the Navy, for the reason that the Army and the naval officers specialize and unfit themselves for other duties ordinarily and are often called upon to serve abroad; that retirement allowances are provided for judges of the United States courts, and for the reason that serving as judicial officers unfits them for other duties; when I think how far we have gone in that direction and how important it is to make our foreign service as strong as possible, and certainly as strong as that of any other nation that flies a flag, I waive my doubts as to the retirement feature and am willing to support the bill as a whole. And when there are adopted the retirement allowances that are fixed by this bill, nevertheless we will still lag behind Great Britain in that respect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the average compensation paid British diplomatic officers of a similar rank is larger than that in this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is my understanding from the record; there can be no question about that.

Now, if this measure is enacted, still the British foreign service will be on a higher basis as to the call it makes on competent young men, as to salaries paid if they enter the service; as to a reasonable guaranty of being taken care of when they become disabled. If you examine the British legislation, you will find that it takes into account the fact that men are very often, early in life, incapacitated physically and sometimes mentally by being subjected to the excessive heat and unhealthy conditions of the Tropics. We propose nothing like that. We do not attempt to equalize with Great Britain in that respect.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I would be glad if the gentleman would explain how the retirement fund is made up so that it may go into the Record. As I understand, it comes from the 5 per cent contribution from the salaries of these various men.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There is a contribution of 5 per cent from the salary. The effect of that is that until about 1945 the annuities from the employees themselves will make up the sum except the initial sum of $50,000. The British official makes no such contribution whatever.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I note that it is very properly provided that the salary of no official shall be decreased by this reorganization.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. But that any amount that a man now receives above what a particular office will receive later on shall cease when the present incumbent goes out of the service.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. TILSON. So that there would be a slight reduction?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There will be a reduction in the salaries of three posts, I think. There are three consuls general serving now—one at London—who are receiving salaries in excess of the salaries provided by the bill, but after those now in such offices cease to serve, then the salaries of those three positions will be lower than the salaries paid at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman an additional five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is true that we are to charge them 5 per cent of their salaries on the retirement fund.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But in order to let them pay the 5 per cent out of their salaries, by this bill we have increased their salaries from 20 per cent on up.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Not as much as 20 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. From 10 per cent on up.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Something, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then we have given them more than enough increase to pay out a little for the retirement fund. It all comes from the pocket of the people after all.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. We have increased the salaries, and the increase will come out of the pockets of the people, except in so far as it comes out of the operations of the foreign service itself, and it has been repeatedly stated here this morning that this is one service that is very nearly self-sustaining. But even if it were otherwise we should discriminate as to what is profitable expenditure and what is unprofitable expenditure, and I just as firmly believe, as I believe anything, that it is to the interest of the wheat raisers and the cotton producers and the cattle and sheep raisers, as well as the manufacturers, to do all that we reasonably can to develop the foreign markets where this country sells, and to give greater opportunity for trade in those markets. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does this bill establish a foreign market for cattle?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. My friend knows that it does not do it directly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If it does, then I am for the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But my friend knows this, because he understands the entire situation, that there is hardly anything more important to-day than to do everything that is possible, whether on a great scale or on a small scale, to secure better markets for the products of America and particularly the products of the farmers who are now the greatest sufferers.

Mr. BLANTON. The only ultimate condition I was trying to guard against was the business situation where we have all of the farmers and stockmen in the United States supporting all of the other people of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am just as much averse to that as the gentleman is. Somebody has said that a good many people live on the farm and a good many people live on the farmer. I am just as much opposed to placing any burden on the farmer, as is the gentleman from Texas, but I think we have to consider carefully and vote fearlessly when we believe that what is proposed is going to result in promoting the general good of the entire people of the country.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The statement has been made that this will increase the cost of the State Department eight or nine hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I wonder if the gentleman has made any comparison of the amount spent by the United States Government for the promotion of peaceful relations with foreign countries, about $8,000,000 a year, with the seven or eight hundred million dollars a year that we spend on the Army and the Navy to prepare for possible war, and whether the gentleman has inquired if a more liberal appropriation for the State Department might not result in the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars for war.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Of course, the gentleman is pointing to something that is very obvious, that we appropriate very heavily for the Army and for the Navy, and very heavily in other directions, and yet we are hypercritical when it comes to a small increase such as that proposed here, the benefits of which to all classes can hardly be calculated in advance. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it requires no argument to convince anyone that our foreign service is the most important service that we have and that the State Department is one of the most important departments of Government. The Secretary of State, when he came before the committee, testified that to-day we are transacting over twice the business that we did before the war. Yet all that this bill which we have discussed to-day takes out of the United States Treasury is $3,600,000 a year. We get enough in from the consular fees to more than pay for the Consular Service, so that all that the taxpayers are required to pay on account of this vast and efficient foreign service is $3,600,000 a year.

So far as the increase in this bill is concerned, deducting the amount that we save in doing away with the post allowance of the former appropriation, is $378,000 a year. That is a very small amount, considering the great benefits that will be accomplished. The Department of State is really a nonpartisan department. Go there and you will see the same officers who have been there for 10 or 20, some of them 30, years. Since our Consular Service and other branches of the Department of State were put under the civil service in 1906, the State Department has been entirely out of politics. It is necessary to offer some inducement for young men to enter our foreign service. It requires a young man of education and efficiency.

A young man to make any rise in the State Department has to be equipped not only with a college education but be conversant with the languages. He must have besides his knowledge of English one or two foreign languages that he can speak fluently and translate accurately. Now, the salaries that we have been paying these young men are so inadequate that there is very little inducement for a young man to enter the foreign service of this Government, and as a result the Secretary of State, not only the present Secretary but others, have informed the committee that young men are leaving the service, that not a sufficient number of young men possessing the necessary qualifications were entering the service, and that a majority of those that did were young men of independent fortunes. I am not criticizing men of independent fortunes going to our foreign service, but simply saying that it is not quite in keeping with the spirit of our democratic institutions that in any department of the Government that conditions should be such that forces any young man of ability and ambition who is not the possessor of a large inherited fortune to leave such Government employment. It is getting to be that way now not only in this country but all others, and we see the foreign departments of other countries proposing to unify their foreign service just the same as we are. Of course, Great Britain for years has had a retirement system like we propose. Why should we have a retirement system? Because a man who goes into the foreign service and after he has been in a great number of years and then leaves it there is no other place, no other foreign service he can enter. He goes out without a trade or profession. He does not understand the business of the world; he is out of touch with other employment, just the same as the post-office employee or the Army or naval officer and many other Government employees; and for that reason we provide a retirement provision in this bill to stabilize and make this great foreign service an attractive service, so that young men of ability will go into it. This bill does not raise the salaries of any minister or ambassador. This does not affect one of them. It goes down to the foundation of our foreign service—the men who are doing the clerical work, the men whose services are indispensable, men who get the facts and know how to get them and bring them to the consul general, to the minister or ambassador.

These men are leaving the service on account of the inadequacy of the compensation. Now this bill only proposes to spend $378,000 more than the former bill; it will stabilize these conditions, and it will provide also for the $50,000 that goes into this retirement fund. That is all it costs, and I want to say, gentlemen of this committee, that the money appropriated for this purpose is money that, in my judgment, is money as well expended as any money that we appropriated. Take the consul general's report at London. Every business man from every State in the Union who ships his goods abroad is anxious to get it and examine it. Every rotary club, every commercial organization wants this bill to be passed. Why? Because they want an efficient foreign service and know that it benefits business. They know the United States is a Nation that is dealing with the whole world, and we have to have efficient men and agents who can compete with our great rivals and competitors. The British ambassador's salary, together with his representation allowance, is $100,000 a year. What do we pay our ambassador to Great Britain? Seventeen thousand five hundred dollars a year. Mr. Davis, formerly a Member of this House, who went over as ambassador to Great Britain, had to tax himself $20,000 to $30,000 a year every year he was over there out of his own private means to sustain himself.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I do not believe that is the spirit of America, and I do not believe the taxpayers of America want any such penurious policy in regard to the administration of our great foreign service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman give him a minute to answer a question?

Mr. PORTER. I will yield the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. BLANTON. And yet you have not raised the ambassador's salary; but the question I want to ask is this: The gentleman argues that this service is self-supporting, and that is absolutely convincing and unanswerable. But suppose it brought in ten times as much as it does now, would the gentleman advocate our paying that thirty or forty extra million dollars in additional salaries?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will ask the gentleman a question. Would he vote for the doubling up or raising of the salary of the ministers and ambassadors—would the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I would not. I want—

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I believe when we raise these salaries we ought to begin at the foundation, and I believe in taking the advice of the Secretary of State and those men in the State Department who are experts upon this. They say raise these salaries first. Then, if it is necessary to raise these other salaries, do so. My friend from Texas criticized this bill because no one had any notice of it. Yet he had notice right on his desk that has been lying there since Monday that this program, including this identical bill, would be taken up Tuesday morning. Yet he criticizes us when if he had looked on his table he would have known the program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is not recognized. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want a statement about me to go unchallenged.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has no right to the floor.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to yield more time, and I ask that the Clerk read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that when a Member in debate places a certain statement or action concerning another Member in his mouth that Member has the right to rise and challenge the statement. That is what the gentleman from Wisconsin did.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the officers in the foreign service shall hereafter be graded and classified as follows, with the salaries of each class herein affixed thereto: Ambassadors and ministers as now or hereafter provided: foreign-service officers as follows: Class 1, $9,000; class 2, $8,000; class 3, $7,000; class 4, $6,000; class 5, $5,000; class 6, $4,500; class 7, $4,000; class 8, $3,500; class 9, $3,000; unclassified, $3,000 to $1,500: Provided, That as many foreign-service officers above class 6 as may be required for the purpose of inspection may be detailed by the Secretary of State for that purpose: And provided further, That all appointments as foreign-service officers and all promotions from class to class of foreign-service officers shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in the past several years there have been on different occasions increases in the salaries of our consular representatives, decided increases, ranging, I would say, offhand, from $1,000 up. There have been no substantial increases in the secretarial force of our Diplomatic Service. I have read carefully the bill and the report.

I recognize the need of increasing the salaries of our clerical force connected with the Diplomatic Service. I have not found any argument, so far, as to the need of increasing radically the salaries in our Consular Service. I have not the figures on hand, but I think there are over 600 in both services combined. Yes; 640, all told, in both services; 120 diplomatic secretaries, and 520 consular officers.

Now, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], who has given much close and thorough consideration to this measure, a measure that creditably bears his name, how much turnover there has been in the Consular Service? And further, what increases there will be in the salaries of consular officers? I am speaking generally, not as to the reduction of the salaries of the two consuls general, who are now receiving $12,000, or those who are receiving the salary of the $8,000 grade, or the like. I would like to know what increases there will be in the pay of the consular officers, and how much turnover there has been in the past year or two.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. ROGERS. I have in my hand a statement prepared for me by the State Department, and necessarily so, because it is based upon the archives and records of the department that has been dealing with this matter of turnover for the last 10 years. The average number of separations from the service per year by resignation is about 25.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman referring now exclusively to the Consular Service, or to the Consular and Diplomatic Services?

Mr. ROGERS. I am referring exclusively to the Consular Service. Let me give year by year the separations as the result of resignations as distinguished from death or involuntary retirement.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Can the gentleman give in that connection the total number of consular officers, so that the proportion will appear?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; I will give both. In 1913 there were 347 consular officers of all classes, and there were 24 retirements. In 1914 there were 363 consular officers of all classes, and there were 29 retirements. It goes on very much in the same way until the last three years. For the year 1920 the number of consular officers rose to 472, and there were 27 retirements by resignation. In 1921 the comparative figures are 520 on the one hand and 22 on the other. In 1922 the figures are 517 on the one hand and 30 on the other. For the 10 years the average retirements from the service have been 6.25 per cent of the total. In other words, there has been a one-sixteenth turnover on the average for the 10 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there anything in the hearings or has the gentleman any information as to how many of those who have retired have done so by reason of inadequacy of salary?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes. Mr. Carr, in the course of his very extended testimony before the committee, said that he could believe, and he described how, men would withstand business offers for a considerable period, and then the pressure would become so great and the economic requirements become so urgent that they had to yield and go out of the service. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to give an instance from my own acquaintance. I do not like on the floor to mention his name, but I will be glad to give it to the gentleman privately.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. One of the ablest men we had in the Consular Service for many years told me that he entered the service with a private fortune of $112,000. He was successful; he was promoted quite rapidly. His salary average for the 16 years or thereabouts that he was in the service was probably higher than that of almost any other man in the Consular Service. He had no children. He was married. He told me that at the end of the 16 years of his service, and with the utmost economy and without display—and I know that was true—he had spent his entire fortune and had to resign in order to leave something for the support of his wife in case he should die.

Mr. STAFFORD. How recent has that been?

Mr. ROGERS. In the last two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much have we increased the salaries of consuls in recent years?

Mr. ROGERS. We have increased the salaries of consuls very little in my time of service. We have increased the secretaries more. When I came here the entrance salary of a secretary was $1,600. It has risen to $4,000. We have increased the entrance salary now to $2,500. The objective of a 20-year service has become $4,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can realize that no matter what the salary may be that will be attached to a consular position, nevertheless there will be temptation to consular officers always to accept the more attractive salaries in private employment.

Mr. ROGERS. The Government can not compete with private business in the matter of salaries. All that it can do and, in my judgment, all that it should attempt to do is to try to provide a reasonable living wage for a married man, with perhaps a child or two. That is all that this bill undertakes to accomplish, having in mind the necessary expenditures that an appropriate representation abroad of a great country necessarily involves.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much general increase will this accord to the various consular officers?

Mr. ROGERS. Taking account of a few decreases and of a few cases where there is no change, the average increase throughout the Consular Service as a whole is 14 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. The increase of the secretarial force of the Diplomatic Service is greater.

Mr. ROGERS. That is considerably larger, especially at the top, where we are anxious to utilize some of the best men, who now as consuls general get so much larger salaries than do the secretaries of the top classes.

Mr. STAFFORD. A little while ago, while the gentleman had the floor in general debate, I was seeking information as to the total cost that the retirement fund would occasion, and the gentleman gave me some very illuminating information. Since then, looking over the hearings to which the gentleman directed my attention, I find that in 1943, when the retirement fund will become fully operative, the charge imposed on the Government will be something like a half-million dollars yearly.

Mr. ROGERS. Not in 1943. The maximum of a half million dollars mentioned in the testimony will be in 1957. Since the hearings were printed, as the result of independent investigations which I have made I am satisfied that that half-million-dollar figure is too high, and I will tell the gentleman why. That half-million-dollar figure, as the gentleman will see if he reads the language carefully, assumes that every man who enters the service at 30 or 35 years of age will stay in the service until he reaches the retirement age of 65. Obviously that is not true. Men retire from the service, men are dismissed, men leave the service because of disability—

Mr. TILSON. And men die.

Mr. ROGERS. And men die. All those causes will keep a large percentage of the total number of men from ever reaching the retirement age and getting the retirement benefits. I talked this morning with the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency. He states that while he does not wish to criticize this figure or the basis on which it proceeds, his judgment is that as a practical matter $400,000 is the maximum which is much more likely to prevail than $500,000. Out of overconservatism the State Department preferred to lay before the House the larger figure.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States are under a very great obligation to the chairman and to the membership of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the long-continued and hard work and the great care and, in my judgment, the rare wisdom that they have displayed in the presentation of this legislation. Still more do I believe that the people of the United States are under obligation to these men. Nothing is more required in better service, nothing is more needed in the securing of men of ability and efficiency in the employment of the Government than in our foreign service. With a world in turmoil, with all the conditions, both political and economic, displaced and in flux, this is the time above all other times when the United States needs men of character, of wisdom, of education, of efficiency, in the foreign service.

I have heard the criticisms that have been made upon this bill. I have been surprised at the fact that not one of them seems to be well founded. First of all, always comes the question that it costs more money to secure good service. Of course, we all realize that; but we ought to realize that as a concomitant of that we should secure good service if it does require more money. But in this particular case we are met with the fact that in the Consular Service and in the retirement proposition contained in this bill, very largely they are self-supporting, or will be. We are also met with the fact that there is not a large increase.

When we come to examine into the particular benefit and advantage that there is in the rearrangement proposed in this bill, I think no man ought to hesitate about giving it his cordial support. We have here not an aristocratic proposition, as some gentlemen seem to believe. We have here, more than ever before in the service, a democratic proposition, by which not the few rich who can go into the service, no matter what the financial requirements may be, shall be called and shall serve, but holding out to a young man of ambition, no matter what his pecuniary condition may be, the prospect of distinction in the service, if he enters it, and an assurance that he will not be required to leave it in a position in which his family will be dependent upon some other resource.

There has never before been presented a better opportunity for the young man to go into the service of the Government assured that there is an opportunity for his best effort and the assurance that it will be well considered by his country. That opportunity is now given by this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I desire especially to commend the proposition, embodied in this bill for the first time in our history, that there shall be not an amalgamation or a consolidation of the Diplomatic and Consular Services but that there shall be an opportunity afforded by the Government to transfer from one service to the other as occasion may require.

Mr. Chairman, particularly at this time when we want to secure a larger foreign market, when upon the Consular Service we must depend for information, for advice, and those good offices that will procure and extend our foreign trade—now at this particular time the Government ought to call to the service the very best men that can be given to such service. It is suggested that it is not for the benefit of the farmer. I believe, Mr. Chairman, speaking moderately, that there is hardly anything that could more benefit the farmer than the improvement of the Consular Service of the United States. I believe that the farmers of the United States believe that in the enlargement of their market they must depend on men who are qualified for the service that will be effective in their interest, and so, representing, as I do, an agricultural community, I want to give in the interest of my particular constituents my unqualified approval of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I want to be permitted to congratulate the Committee on Foreign Affairs for bringing in this splendid piece of constructive legislation, which, I believe, marks a very important stage in the progress of lawmaking for the development of our foreign service. The money that we expend for the Army and for the Navy in peace times is largely in the nature of insurance. It is to protect the Government against what may happen, against which we must provide adequate safeguards. The money that we expend for our foreign service comes back to us over and over again in direct and indirect benefits. There are some people who think that our foreign service, especially the diplomatic branch, is chiefly ornamental. That charge never was entirely true, and it is less true now than ever before. The functions of our diplomatic officers are becoming less and less political and more and more commercial.

Our foreign service has developed greatly since 1914. I think it costs about three times as much now to maintain it as it did then. That was partly due to the activities of the war and partly to the creation of new nations by the treaty of Versailles, necessitating the appointment of more consular and diplomatic officers. But it was chiefly due to the effects of the war upon the financial and economic condition of the nations and the creation of a tremendous competitive spirit which has made it necessary for us, if we are to hold our own with other nations who are looking for business, to maintain a thoroughly efficient foreign service. It should be equal to that of any other nation in the world.

We have a fine Consular Service now, and we have an excellent Diplomatic Service, but in the Diplomatic Service opportunity is practically denied to a poor man. It is a service in which the rich man only can enter, because rich men only can meet the expenses which fall upon our diplomatic officials. Now, that is lamentable, and it ought to be corrected, and it is one of the main purposes of this bill to correct it. It is one of the main purposes of this bill to so adjust the salaries that a young man of moderate means can enter the Diplomatic Service and make it a career. For example, a first secretary at London is compelled by diplomatic usage to maintain a residence where he can entertain, and he is required to have a motor car and a chauffeur. It is evident that a diplomatic secretary can not maintain a residence where he can entertain and a motor car and do all the other things necessary to uphold his position on a salary of $4,000 a year. This bill, if it becomes law, will accomplish a great deal, but I believe there is one other thing which we ought to do to enable our Diplomatic and Consular Service to reach the highest point of efficiency. I believe we should have a diplomatic and consular school in the State Department. We maintain at Annapolis a school that we may have efficient naval officers. We maintain a military academy at West Point in order that we may have efficient Army officers.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman know that the colleges and universities have courses in foreign service for that purpose? Georgetown and most of the universities have courses of that kind.

Mr. HUSTED. Some have courses in diplomacy, but that is also true so far as military instruction is concerned. Nearly all the colleges to-day give instruction in military subjects, but we would not think of abolishing West Point and we do not consider abolishing the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I say it is just as important, and I believe it is far more important, to maintain a school where we can train men to be consuls and diplomatic officers as it is to maintain military and naval academies. The work is highly technical and the best instruction can be given in the State Department by our own consuls and diplomats.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does not the gentleman think that notwithstanding the fact that some of the universities and colleges have these courses that provision should be made for training these men in the very business they will have to engage in?

Mr. HUSTED. I certainly do think so. Something is being done in the colleges, but I believe it could be done much better here at Washington and at very small expense. We have in the State Department the men who could be the teachers. The classes would be comparatively small. I do not believe there would be more than 25 or 30 men in a class. We would not have to employ additional instructors. The men are right here at the head of the various bureaus and divisions in the State Department. We have the economists and technical experts ready at hand. This is an easy, inexpensive, and practical way to secure a body of highly trained men who are needed in the field to advance the commercial and political interests of the United States. There is no other way, in my opinion, in which the results can be obtained as quickly or as well.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I had not intended to say anything on this bill, but this is one bill that is like one of which several years ago, when it was brought on the floor of the House Mr. Mann, of Illinois, said, "Why, that old gentleman has been knocking around the halls of the Capitol here for a good many years, and you ought to have shaved him before you brought him on the floor."

However, involved in this discussion is a proposition that has not been discussed at all, which I think the House ought to take into consideration. In the first place, the commercial attachés that have been established within recent years are worth infinitely more to the business of the country than all of the so-called consular and State Department activities.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Sisson. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman spoke of this bill or one like it having been introduced several years ago. I should like to have information as to when that was. I have been a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for 10 years, and I have investigated the work of the committee for a number of years before that time. I do not remember that there was ever a bill before that committee for this purpose.

Mr. Sisson. I do not believe it was exactly for the same purpose. I may be mistaken about that, but it was for an increase in the Diplomatic Service anyway. However, there is no need of getting into a controversy about that, because it was said only as a pleasantry.

Mr. TEMPLE. And the gentleman could edit it out of his remarks.

Mr. Sisson. Oh, I shall act upon that as I deem best. I do not intend to let the gentleman from Pennsylvania either edit my remarks or do my thinking for me. The commercial attaché has been the individual who has done the business of the country some good. I have never been an advocate of dollar diplomacy. I believe our Diplomatic Service abroad should be kept separate from our business.

The English had engaged for a long time in the consular drummer. After the American Government established the commercial attachés, the English Government sent a commission here to investigate the commercial attaché system, and they have practically adopted our system in England. I know that there are some people who want to convert every minister and all our consular officers into nothing but business getters, but there are frequently delicate matters rising between nations that are such that if the State Department were to engage in the business of hustling for business in competition with another nation, it might bring about feelings that are not conducive to peace and to the good relations that should exist between nations. The commercial attachés are looked upon and recognized as the Government's drummers, as the Government's business agents, and rather than increase this service through this bill, rather than increase the political end, I would infinitely rather increase the salaries and the number of the commercial attachés, because they can very much better transact that sort of business than can the political branch of the Government. If the consular agent is to transact business for the Government, he is also constantly engaged in certain political correspondence. These, in my judgment, ought not to be mixed. A great deal has been said in the last few years about dollar diplomacy. The gentleman who took his seat has talked about dollar diplomacy, and he wanted the State Department to perform more of the functions of business than to look after the political end of the thing. I think you make a mistake when you do that. There was an effort made to circumscribe the commercial attachés by cutting down appropriation, and the then chairman of the Committee of the Whole, which was considering the matter, and I think he was technically correct, ruled the matter out of order. An appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair by a gentleman from New York, and the Chair was overruled and the commercial attachés were put back into the bill. Why? Because the business elements of the country, from San Francisco to New York and from Chicago to New Orleans, were up in arms against a curtailment of this service that had done so much good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Sisson. Personally, I would infinitely rather that this money be expended in increasing the commercial attachés whose business it is to go out and get business, whose business it is to find out first what the market is, and second, in what sort of shape the goods shall be in order to be sold in the foreign market. Take, for instance, the Chinese and Japanese market for various kinds of cotton must be understood by us.

The goods that would suit the European countries would not at all suit the fashions and styles of the Orient, and the commercial attachés have sent the samples of goods back to the various factories, and they have given the factories the facts and figures about the number of yards of cloth of a certain character which will probably be sold in certain markets in the Orient, and the result is that the manufacturing establishments of the United States are enabled to send traveling men into those countries and sell their goods. You have to know first what a country will take, and the manufacturers are willing then to put their money into the business. So when this effort was made to curtail the expenditures for commercial attachés the whole business of the United States was up in arms, and the influence was felt in every congressional district in the United States and was reflected on the floor of the House when the ruling of the chairman was overruled. Rather than have this character of legislation, rather than have an increase in the appropriation, which means an increase of dollar diplomacy, I would infinitely prefer to have this money expended in the enlargement of the commercial attachés and of their activities.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's attention was called to the fact that this is a new proposition. In reading the report I find that this bill is practically the same as H. R. 12543, introduced in 1922, and that H. R. 12543, as stated by Secretary Hughes, is almost identical to H. R. 17; so that it must have been before the committee before. I do not know when H. R. 17 was introduced, but it was prior to August, 1922; and this clearly shows this question has been before the committee before, and that you were correct in your first statement.

Mr. Sisson. Yes. I have not gone into detail about it, and my recollection about the bill that Mr. Mann had reference to was just slight. The thing that called it to my mind at all was that Mr. Mann said that it should have been shaved before it was brought in.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, before I begin what I wish to say, I desire to revert to the two bills which have been discovered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS], who just interrupted the gentleman from Mississippi. They are earlier forms of this bill introduced not in a former Congress but in this Congress, and the second and third forms were introduced after some work had been done in revision of the bill, either by its author or by the committee itself. It is all one bill. That which was introduced some years ago, to which the gentleman from Mississippi refers, was the bill, I think, which provided for the purchase of embassies and legations in foreign countries, an entirely different matter, having nothing to do with the reorganization of the Diplomatic and Consular Service.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will yield, does not the gentleman think he really had in mind the act passed in 1915, which is now the law under which we are operating?

Mr. TEMPLE. That increased some salaries but did not provide any general reorganization.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; but it provides certain appointments in the Diplomatic and Consular Service.

Mr. TEMPLE. But certainly not coordinating the two foreign services.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It did not.

Mr. TEMPLE. I have been somewhat interested also in what the gentleman from Mississippi has said about "dollar" diplomacy. He is very much in favor of increasing the number of commercial attachés and increasing the appropriations in a way that would add to their efficiency. But to what would the attachés be attached if there were no Diplomatic and Consular Service? The commercial attaché, the military attaché, the naval attaché are useful. There is no doubt about it.

The commercial attaché collects information which is of use to the American business man, furnishes him information that may increase our exports or our imports, but the work of the commercial attaché would be of little use if it were not for the work done by the Diplomatic and Consular Service. International trade is carried on under treaty agreements, and you can not have it without having a diplomatic foundation. When we come to the actual business of the Government in connection with international trade, there is no way of handling it except through the consular office. We might appoint commercial attachés until we would expend money on them equal to the whole amount appropriated for the Diplomatic and Consular Service, but we must do business with foreign countries in the way the foreign countries will permit, just as they do business with us in the way that we permit. The way that has grown up in the experience of the world is through the foreign offices, which correspond in other lands to what in our country is called the State Department. The diplomatic and consular services provide the only way the world recognizes for carrying on this foreign intercourse. We can not modify the customs of the world by an act passed by the American Congress, for our jurisdiction is limited to our own territory and ships.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. To illustrate that point, it is my understanding that when the commercial attachés were first sent to London they had an office independent from that of the diplomatic office, and they found themselves absolutely compelled to tie up with the diplomatic office, because nobody was looking for or finding them out, and did not expect them in any place except the diplomatic office.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is the only way that their official character can be made known effectively to foreign governments. Now, "dollar diplomacy"; that phrase has been used as a term of reproach or to ridicule the use of diplomatic representatives in the interest of business. Before I discuss "dollar diplomacy" I want to say I do not accept the doctrine of economic determinism which lies at the foundation of so much socialistic philosophy, but, after all, what is the principal occupation of mankind? Earning a living. Men are selling their services making things with their hands, selling the goods that they produce. Eight hours a day, 10 hours a day, 12 hours or 15 hours a day, what are men doing? Earning a living, doing business. That which occupies so large a portion of our time is certainly worthy of attention, and when we come to doing business with foreign peoples, earning a living by dealing with foreign markets, we have to do it through the foreign office.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What is the per cent of the salary allowed on retirement?

Mr. TEMPLE. I am not discussing that question just now. The gentleman will find it in the tables.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It is not in the tables.

Mr. TEMPLE. Here are the hearings.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I thank the gentleman; I did not mean to interrupt his speech.

Mr. TEMPLE. There is absolutely no reason for treating dollar diplomacy with contempt. As I say, 8 hours, 10 hours, or 12 hours a day are spent in earning a living, in earning dollars. Why? Because we want to use them. We may use them in purchasing the things that satisfy our ordinary physical wants; we may use the surplus in charity or in promoting religion. Whatever we may consider the noblest occupation of our time, most of us have to spend the greater part of our waking time in merely earning a living, and perhaps a little more which may be devoted to these nobler aims. That part of the business of earning a living which is done with foreign peoples is arranged for by the machinery of the Diplomatic and Consular Services. When they negotiate commercial treaties, that is dollar diplomacy. Every American diplomatic and consular officer should be an attorney for the United States, attentive to the business of the American people. We want to put this service on a basis that will make it the equal of the service of our competitors, our customers, those from whom we buy, those to whom we sell. The world is more and more coming together. We are next-door neighbors to everybody everywhere. What is the reason now that we in this country find ourselves commercially economically in trouble?

What is the matter with the business of the country? One thing is that the whole world has been turned upside down; 15,000,000 men dead in the war, of battle deaths and disease; $350,000,000,000 of capital blown to bits. Russia used to export a great deal of wheat to western Europe; hardly any now. Why is not Europe a better market for our wheat than it was before the war? Because the destruction of men and of capital and the upset of business organization in Europe is such that those people can not buy. We can not sell to people who can not buy. But if there is to be a restoration of the economic system of the world, if business is ever to get good again, we want to be on the ground not only to participate in the benefits that come from it but to aid in the restoration. Our Consular Service and our Diplomatic Service—our foreign service when the two have been made one—may be one of the most efficient agencies, and one of the ways through which the United States can most effectively exert its influence for the reconstruction of a shattered world. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes in which to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] over there. I do not think I shall want more than five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate with a great deal of pleasure this afternoon, because I find both sides of the House are in favor of our country entering into foreign trade and endeavoring to establish foreign trade by stabilizing the Department of State, increasing the salaries of various employees, and providing for greater influence of the Department of State so that the United States might occupy a position in its dealings with world affairs among foreign nations commensurate with its standing as a great commercial Nation and holding a leading position on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans not excelled by any other nation.

After this Congress came together, when the President called us into special session in November last, he intimated to us that it was necessary for us to pass legislation that would permanently establish an American merchant marine. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries brought the bill up in this House, and after three days of general debate and two days of discussion under the five-minute rule the House of Representatives passed the bill in this body by 54 majority. That bill should have received 300 majority; in fact, there ought to have been no votes cast against it. If the membership of this body had talked as sensibly then as they do now, there would not have been many votes cast against the bill providing for an American merchant marine, and we should have had the bill enacted into law long since. The bill was sent to the Senate. At once there was a bloc made against it. What sense was there in having a bloc? Can anybody give any sensible reason for it? Nothing in the world but inexhaustible wind; that is all it was. [Laughter.] Every sort of proposition was brought up there in opposition; people commenced to bring in objections and to propose something new to take up time.

When I listened to what has been said here to-day on both sides of the aisle, with no dissension on the Democratic side, no caucus has been held on the bill we are considering to-day. I recall the fact that when the merchant marine bill was reported the Democratic Party held a caucus to determine their course and bound their own people, as far as they could, to be against a merchant marine. A merchant marine is as essential as this increase in our foreign service for foreign business. You say, "We want foreign business." I ask, "How are you going to get it?" Do you mean it in your innermost souls that you want to extend the foreign trade of the United States?

I am not opposed to this bill; I believe in it; I believe fully in it. I recognize that the bill that has been prepared and presented to you to-day is one of the best bills ever brought before the House, and it is shown by the fact that it comes on a non-partisan line. If there is any one bill that ought to have been considered in this House on a non-partisan line it is the bill for keeping the American flag on the sea—the shipping bill. Why should we for one minute think of pulling down the American flag? Why should we refuse to maintain it? Why should we want to foster trade abroad, why should we want to talk about increasing our trade abroad, and then stab the only instrument that can increase our trade abroad, the shipping bill now pending in the Senate? We now have an American merchant marine. It was first established under the rule of the Democratic Party. They built up this merchant marine at an immense cost. Now, they propose to throw it away, and they find many men on the Republican side who seem to agree with them. I can not understand it. I have been trying to get it through my head, but I can not.

I am glad I stayed here this afternoon to listen to these remarks on this foreign service bill, because I find that there is a unity of feeling concerning it on both sides of the aisle. Partisanship seems to have disappeared. The only thing they are partisan on, over on the Democratic side of this House, is against the American flag. There it hangs, above the Speaker's chair. We once had a well-established merchant marine. Who destroyed it? The British Government destroyed it from 1861 to 1865 when they endeavored to separate this Nation, the North from the South. Why is this fight in endeavoring to destroy the flag on the sea? What is the purpose in trying to keep the flag off the sea? I have been trying to get it through my head. Usually my head is pretty clear, but I am beginning to think that I am thickheaded. [Laughter.]

My gracious, I can not understand at all the Democratic side of the House, which is so anxious now to spend money to build up trade, to do everything else they can do. But they do not want us to interfere with England. I do not care what country you interfere with. Stand by the United States. We are the next country to England in the foreign trade. Why should we surrender a single rag of what we have in our merchant marine to-day and hand it over freely and with joy to our greatest enemy in the world trade?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman recollect that there were 24 Republicans who voted against that bill and 23 Democrats who voted for it?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not know how many there were who voted for it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Twenty-four Republicans voted against it and 23 Democrats voted for it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am very sorry for the thickheadedness of the Republicans who voted against it, and I am very glad for the intelligence of the Democrats who voted for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. It is the gentleman's own party now who are holding up that bill in the Senate.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, no; do not tell me that.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the gentleman's party a majority in the Senate?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That has nothing to do with it. They have no rules there for the transaction of business, but they may act on the shipping bill before the 4th of March.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will be guilty of lese majesty if he does not look out.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Do not you worry about me. I can take care of myself and take care of the rest of you besides. [Laughter.] If there were 23 Democrats who voted for this bill, thank God there were 23 intelligent Democrats, and I am disgusted with every Republican who voted against it, for no one had any reason to vote against a bill providing for keeping the American flag on the sea, because one must realize that the withdrawal of competition means an increase in freight rates to the farmer and to the American consumer.

Mr. SEARS. I see by the press that perhaps the President will ask the Senate to lay aside the ship subsidy bill and take up the foreign debt refunding bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, you can read anything you want to in the newspapers. I do not want to waste my time on any such nonsense as that. Never mind what the newspapers say. [Laughter.] I have read the newspapers a great deal in my life, and I read both sides, too. When I see a statement that has no sense in it, I do not pay any attention to it. Once in a while you will find a paper on the Democratic side that has got a little good sense, and if you would read the newspapers that publish decent material about the American merchant marine, instead of 23 Democrats coming over and voting for that bill, there would be more than twice that number.

Mr. SEARS. It was a Republican paper in which I read that.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Never mind what you read it in. There is no excuse for any living man in this body voting to strike down the American flag on the seas. [Applause.] I do not care whether a man is on this side of the aisle or on the other side, he ought not to do that. There is no reason in the world for any Member of this body trying to destroy American commerce. There is no reason in the world why anyone should not do all he can to build up an American merchant marine. I believe another opportunity will be given you to vote on the bill to establish the American merchant marine before this session closes. [Applause.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know of no way in which a Member of this House can get information about a bill if he is not a member of the committee which has considered the bill, unless he asks questions and seeks information from members of the committee who have charge of the bill or unless the report of the committee or the hearings disclose the information. A while ago the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], in a very abrupt manner and I think in a very undignified manner, if he will permit me to say so, when I asked him a simple question for information about a matter that concerns a great number of Members of this House, referred me to a pamphlet. I do not know why he referred me to that pamphlet unless he knew as little about it as I did, because I have not found anything more from the pamphlet than I knew before. I read this report with a great deal of care, and I still do not know the basis of percentage upon which this retired pay is computed. As I understand, we are asked to take $325,000 out of the Treasury and give it to certain employees of the Consular Service. I was seeking information, and I am still seeking information. I believe that the employees of the Consular Service should be paid enough to put them beyond the realm of temptation, and that they should be on a parity with the employees of the consular service of any other nation in the world, but I can not sit here as a Member of the House and vote in the dark, and I do not propose to do so; and unless I have more information on this subject I am going to vote against this provision of the bill, because I am here as a Representative of the people, and I propose to know what I am going to vote about, and I know of no other way to find out unless I ask some Member in charge of the bill to give me that information when the report and the hearings do not disclose the information desired. When I ask that Member for information I do not think it is fair to a new Member that I should be practically insulted in the way that the gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke to me a while ago.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do.

Mr. TEMPLE. I am very sorry that the gentleman thought I meant to insult him. I did not. I was discussing, under the 5-minute rule and under the 5-minute limit, a matter in which I was interested, which I wished to present to the House. The gentleman interrupted me with a question as remote from the thing I was discussing as the North Pole is from the South. I said that I was discussing another question, and I handed him the hearings which contained the information that he asked for.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will admit, gentlemen of the committee, that a new Member does not have much opportunity here to get information unless he just breaks loose and asks for it.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. In just a moment. I am a new Member of this House, but I at least have a few gray hairs on my head and have had a little experience before I came here, and I came here with an honest intent and an honest effort on my part to represent my people and to represent this country as well as I could with the lights before me. As long as I stay here I am going to vote intelligently if I know how to, and I do not think that Members who have had long experience should deal with a new Member in such a manner as the gentleman from Pennsylvania undertook to deal with me a while ago.

Mr. ROGERS. I just want to say, if the gentleman will allow me, that I answered every question that was asked me in general debate—

Mr. ABERNETHY. I was not referring to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. And I will be very glad indeed to answer any question which the gentleman may have in mind.

Mr. ABERNETHY. A number of us would like to know about this retirement feature. You are asking us to vote on the retirement of these consular employees. We would like to know the percentage of the pay that a man will receive when he retires. In the Army and Navy they get a certain percentage of their active pay when they retire, and the answer to this question might determine how we should vote. I had made up my mind to vote against the bill until I heard the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. Then I came to the conclusion to support it, but, certainly, if we are going to be asked to vote large sums of money without knowing for what we are voting, you can not expect us to do so. The statement made on the floor is that this will cost $325,000 from the Treasury, and if we do not have the information we seek how do you expect to carry the bill through the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the official designation "Foreign Service officer," as employed throughout this act, shall be deemed to denote permanent officers in the Foreign Service below the grade of minister, all of whom are subject to promotion on merit, and who may be assigned to duty in either the diplomatic or the consular branch of the Foreign Service at the discretion of the President.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. One good effect of this bill is that it changes the designation "Diplomatic and Consular Service of the United States" to "Foreign Service of the United States," and therefore avoids some criticism, that we have had heretofore, that we have lost our diplomacy. But that is not the point I wanted to get at. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how many of the officers under this bill are over the age of 60.

Mr. ROGERS. I can not tell the gentleman how many are over the age of 60, but I can tell him that there are 35 over the age of 65, which is the age of retirement.

Mr. SEARS. Under this bill there are 35 now over the age of 65?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; who will automatically be separated from the service.

Mr. SEARS. And receive retirement pay?

Mr. ROGERS. Unless in the discretion of the President they may be retained until they are 70.

Mr. SEARS. I know; but they probably will be retired when the age of 65 is reached. That is the usual custom. The gentleman does not know how many in the classes of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and so forth, there are over the age of 50?

Mr. ROGERS. I have not segregated by age the 640 members of the present foreign service. I think, however, I can get that information for the gentleman by Thursday.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to incorporate in this bill some language which will prohibit the appointment of any person over the age of 50 to any position in the foreign service? I would like myself to make it 45 years, if the retirement feature is to remain in the bill; but I know this can not be done.

Mr. ROGERS. That is in the law and that law is carried in this bill.

Mr. SEARS. So that nobody over the age of 50 can be appointed under this bill?

Mr. ROGERS. That is true.

Mr. SEARS. It has been shown that this bill will cost the Government $340,000, and no one seems to know how much additional the retirement section will cost, at least more than we are now spending, but I have learned since I came here that the way to economize is to spend, and the way to carry out our political pledges of economy and a reduction of taxes is to increase the cost of running the Government. Therefore, while I am deeply interested in the success of every branch of our Government, I can not support this measure unless a great deal of additional information as to the total estimated cost to the taxpayers and the urgent need of this legislation at this particular time is given me.

We talk very much about economy, but when it comes to the final vote we find ourselves voting for most any increase that comes along. By that I do not intend to convey the idea that I would have any man underpaid. Certainly the gentleman should give us that information before we vote on the bill so that we may know what it will cost this Government. Whether it will cost half a million or a million dollars as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, who just preceded me, and not have us vote for something about which we know practically nothing.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in eight minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to express my own appreciation of the work that the committee has put upon this bill which, to my mind, seems to be one of the most important measures that has been considered during the two terms I have spent in Congress. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question in reference to section 3. We have in the State Department a number of men, I do not know how many, who are skilled in foreign affairs, but I do not think they would be included in the term "foreign service." I refer to men who are in the office of the solicitor, to the head of the Diplomatic and Consular Bureau, and other positions of that kind. They are not in the foreign service. Is that correct?

Mr. ROGERS. They are in the foreign service only when they are here on a maximum detail of three or four years from the foreign service. The men who are permanent here, like Mr. Carr, Director of the Consular Service, and Mr. Castle, Chief of the Division of Western European Affairs, and some others, are not in the foreign service and will not be either benefited or injured by this bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Has the gentleman any approximate idea of the number of those who are the heads of departments, or subheads, who are in the State Department in that way and who are really a part of our foreign service, who are under this bill made a part of this foreign service?

Mr. ROGERS. Counting the various men who are classed as drafting officers in the Department of State, I think there may be 30 or 40 who I assume would be included in the gentleman's question.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Personally, it has always seemed to me that men of that type are merely part of our foreign service, and I had been in hopes that some of that type would be provided for in legislation of this character.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will note that in section 5 we have made a partial beginning to an accomplishment which apparently he has in mind. We provide that appointments to the foreign service may be made after five years of continuous service by transfer from the Department of State. That would permit such a man as may be the head of a bureau in the department and who has served there for a period long enough to make one sure that his appointment was not a mere political subterfuge, to be transferred to the foreign service on equal terms with men who have been in the foreign service all of the time. That is a good stepping stone.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I think so. At the present time the Undersecretary of State is what is known, as I understand it, as a "career" man and was transferred from an embassy position to that of Undersecretary of State. What would be his status under the provision limiting the period that an officer of the foreign service could come here and be in the State Department?

Mr. ROGERS. Assuming that when the present Undersecretary of State was appointed this bill had been a law, he would have lost his foreign-service status altogether by accepting the position as Undersecretary of State.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What about his wanting to go back into the service?

Mr. ROGERS. Then he could be reappointed to the foreign service, but he would have to take his chances on that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This bill would in no wise interfere with the transfer of men to positions of great importance in the service here?

Mr. ROGERS. It would not interfere. It would not change the present situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I notice that subdivision (a) of section 16 provides as follows:

The age of retirement shall be 65 years: Provided, That the President may in his discretion retain any foreign service officer who has reached the age of 65 years for such period not exceeding five years as he may deem for the interests of the United States.

I recall that when the retirement act which had to do with the Railway Mail Service was passed there was a provision in that act that those men should be retired, as I remember it, at the age of 62 years. Then there was a provision that if they were in mental and physical health and vigor at that time they might be retained for an additional two years. There was also similar provision made for another period of two years after that. Executive orders were issued, however, which practically abrogated both the letter and the spirit of that law, and those men were arbitrarily retired, in many instances, I think, to the impairment of the service. I know one or two cases came under my own personal observation of men who had been long in the service, still active and vigorous, but who were displaced despite the fact that their positions could not have been filled by men more competent or industrious. I wish to ask the chairman if he thinks there is any likelihood of a repetition of that practice in this instance, or will the plain terms of the measure be safeguarded by the provision that the President of the United States will be the one who shall determine that matter? Is it anticipated that this provision in this law with reference to five years will be no more operative than the two periods of two years each which we provided for in the retirement act that had to do with the Railway Mail Service?

Mr. ROGERS. Of course, it is purely a matter of speculation as to what some future public official, whom we do not even know, may desire to do. If a man is in the foreign service and is a good man, I think he will be retained after he is 65 years of age, because he is a hard man to replace from the bottom, because of his peculiar characteristics. In other words, from my experience with the way in which the State Department has exercised discretion in these general fields in the past, my guess is that we shall have a fair operation of this law.

Mr. LANHAM. I anticipate that, but I should not like to see the legislative intent abrogated in the same way it was in the Railway Mail Service, to which I have referred, and I trust it will not be done in this instance if this bill passes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That foreign service officers may be appointed as secretaries in the Diplomatic Service or as consular officers or both: Provided, That all such appointments shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That all official acts of such officers while on duty in either the diplomatic or the consular branch of the foreign service shall be performed under their respective commissions as secretaries or as consular officers.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 18, I move to strike out the words "in the Diplomatic Service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 18, strike out "in the Diplomatic Service."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on January 24, 1920, when the diplomatic bill was before the House, on points of order made by myself and by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] $650,000 was knocked out of the bill as being increases not authorized by law. One hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars was knocked out on such points of order as being increases in salaries alone. Most of the $650,000 was for post allowances. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] prevailed upon the Committee on Rules to bring in a rule making all of those items in order. So, on Monday, January 26, 1920, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, in order to restore the items into the bill, would offer amendments placing them all back in the bill. So, back in 1920 there were $650,000 increases for post allowances and $138,000 were increases for salaries alone for the diplomatic offices. Now, concerning those increases, I want to show you what the then distinguished Democratic leader on this floor [Mr. KITCHIN] at that time said. I read from the RECORD, page 2070, of January 26, 1920:

Mr. KITCHIN. The only reason in the world which the Secretary of State gives is to enable these secretaries of the ambassadors to go into good society, into "tango" and "ko-tow" society. [Laughter.] He says here in the report:

"As the lieutenants of the ministers and ambassadors, the secretaries must be able to mingle with all classes of people and associate upon a plane of equality with the members of the highest social and official circles of the capitals in which they are located."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is not that caused by the fact that the social standard was set so high by the members of the peace commission and the social dignitaries that went to Paris? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. That is possible; it is very possible that the committee has anticipated that, and taken care of it. But Mr. Lansing does not ask for it, except to permit these secretaries to meet and mingle socially with the kings and queens and monarchs, the princes and princesses, and the lords and ladies of Europe, and have them tango and ko-tow around with royalty; not to perform their duties in office. [Laughter.] It may be that that is where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] gets the idea in his head, which he expressed on Saturday, that the American ambassadors are really figureheads; that they do not do anything except do the society act, and the secretaries have been doing the work. Now, the Secretary of State wants the secretaries to do the "society act" and let the ambassadors work. [Laughter.]

So there were increases then; and this has been the pet ambition of the gentleman from Massachusetts ever since I have been in Congress, to try to raise these salaries—

Mr. ROGERS. And to give the young man without means a chance to enter this service and do good work for his country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I will guarantee to-day that you can let every one of them resign and I can find new applications tomorrow from able men in Massachusetts alone to fill every place. Talk about not being able to get material to fill this service! Why, you can get it from one side of the Nation to the other.

The only argument that is made here this evening is that it is self-sustaining; that we are about to make it pay. Why, suppose the Post Office Department was to take in $100,000,000 a year revenue more than it pays out, would the gentleman distribute that $100,000,000 in increases of salary? Suppose our revenue service, as suggested by my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK], should take in one hundred times as much as it takes in now, would you distribute all that in increased salaries and expenses? Why, that is a ridiculous argument; there is nothing to it. I want to say that it pays every Member of Congress to watch these propositions. Why, one gentleman on that committee said that we had notice of this. Why, the notice I got through the press and elsewhere was that Congress to-day was to pass on the debt-funding proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question as to his intention with reference to proceeding with the bill. I understand the gentleman does not hope to conclude this bill this afternoon. I know he has been very busily engaged, and perhaps he does not realize how bad the weather is; and a great many Members are going to have to go some distance—it is a very bad season for illness, as the gentleman knows—and I suggest to the gentleman, as he does not hope to finish this evening, it would be a very nice thing if he would move that the committee rise.

Mr. PORTER. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that a vote be had on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that is a pro forma amendment, and I ask permission to withdraw it.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section be now terminated.

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13880) for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BULWINKLE, for five days on account of official business; and

To Mr. RAKER, for to-day on account of official business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 7, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

IN THE SENATE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, January 31, 1923.

Whereas the immigration laws enacted by the Congress of the United States have operated so as to work injustice on many foreign born aspiring to be citizens of this country, to deny to the oppressed of other countries the refuge and the opportunity which this country has traditionally offered to the human race, and to deprive this country itself of that influx of law-abiding, industrious, and thrifty men and women such as have in the past built up our industries and our commerce;

Whereas the most objectionable feature of such immigration laws is the so-called "quota" provision thereof:

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That Congress be, and it hereby is, memorialized so to revise the immigration laws as to eliminate therefrom such objectionable provision and to provide a statute which, while judiciously excluding undesirable elements, will permit of the free immigration to the country of those who intend by honest, earnest, and worthy means to take advantage of the benefits of our Nation and its institutions.

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the Congress.

By order of the senate.

D. F. MULLANEY, Clerk.

In assembly, February 1, 1923.

Concurred in without amendment.

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

Mr. McCUMBER presented the following resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state of the State of North Dakota, do hereby certify that the following concurrent resolution was adopted by the eighteenth legislative assembly.

Dated at Bismarck, N. Dak., this 3d day of February, 1923.

[SEAL.]

THOMAS HALL, Secretary of State.

Concurrent resolution introduced by J. C. Miller.

Be it resolved by the House of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein):

Whereas the location of the training school of the State of North Dakota is insanitary by reason that portions of its site are annually inundated by the Missouri and Heart Rivers, causing great financial loss and being a source of disease; and

Whereas said training school is in a much overcrowded condition, having room to comfortably house and care for only about one-third of its present occupants; and

Whereas children of all ages and sexes and of varying degree of moral and mental development are thrown together, thereby creating an improper atmosphere; and

Whereas there is an insufficient amount of land in connection with the said training school for the employment of such pupils during such time as they are not occupied in mental training or recreation; and

Whereas the property now used by the State of North Dakota for a training school is badly needed for other purposes; and

Whereas the resources of the State have been impaired by drought and other causes of crop failure to such an extent that it can not provide the necessary facilities needed for those requiring a training school; and

Whereas the United States Government now owns and controls a tract of land, with buildings thereon, known as Fort Lincoln, admirably situated for the purpose of a training school; and

Whereas such land and buildings are wholly unoccupied and are an expense to the Government in the repair, maintenance, and upkeep thereof: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States at its earliest possible convenience take such action as is necessary to the end that this property may become available to the State of North Dakota for the use thereof as a State training school; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and one to each of the Members of both Houses of Congress from the State of North Dakota, immediately upon its passage and approval.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, referring to page 106 of the bill, I offer an amendment, in line 12, to strike out the numerals "$56,589,910" and to insert in lieu thereof "$27,000,000." The item to which I refer is what is known as the rivers and harbors item, and the amount which I offer in lieu of the figures in the bill is the amount which was recommended by the Budget Bureau.

I called attention yesterday to the peculiar way in which the rivers and harbors appropriation item comes to the Senate for consideration at this time. It is here in a single item in the War Department appropriation bill. We are practically deprived of any opportunity of considering or discussing the separate items which make up the $56,000,000. But the point which I now present is the question of whether we shall disregard entirely the recommendations of the Budget Bureau.

I am not opposed to rivers and harbors appropriations, as such, in their entirety. I recognize that there are projects which have merit and for which appropriations ought to be made, but I think if there are any two propositions to which the party now in power and responsible for legislation were committed in the last campaign it was, first, to give the Budget law a fair opportunity to demonstrate its worth and, second, that of economy. As the President said in his address to the heads of the departments some weeks ago, it is practically impossible to have economy in public expenditures unless we in good faith undertake to apply the Budget law. Now, I have not been a believer in the advocacy of the Budget system to the extent of some of its advocates. I feel that the responsibility after all is here in the Congress. But if it is to be given a fair opportunity, now is the time to test our faith in the law.

What is known as the McCormick budget law was passed about a year ago, and this is really the first test which the law is to have. Strangely enough and peculiarly enough, the test comes between the budget law and the rivers and harbors appropriation. As stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] yesterday—

Mr. MCCORMICK. The Senator from Idaho does not think it is strange that the test should come there? Where more likely would it come than on the rivers and harbors appropriation?

Mr. BORAH. I should say, then, that strangely enough the defeat of the budget law will come when it meets the rivers and harbors appropriation item.

Mr. MCCORMICK. That is more interesting.

Mr. BORAH. At any rate, we are now met with the proposition of whether we shall wholly disregard the recommendations of the Budget Bureau when it comes to the question of appropriating for rivers and harbors. The Budget Bureau recommended $27,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Did the Budget Bureau specifically state the items of the appropriation and the amount for each? I wondered for what they recommended appropriations, or whether or not they recommended a lump sum.

Mr. BORAH. I understand they recommended a lump sum, and, of course, they made a recommendation after studying, as I understand, the different projects. That is my understanding.

Mr. WATSON. I did not know but that it was in the report.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Does the Senator understand that they studied the different projects?

Mr. BORAH. That is what I understand.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Is there any claim that the Appropriations Committee studied each one of the projects on which an estimate was made by the engineers and considered the feasibility and propriety of each of the projects?

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not say that the Committee on Appropriations studied each project. I said I assumed that the Budget Bureau must have studied the different projects in order to arrive at an intelligent conclusion.

Mr. MCCUMBER. But there is no evidence here that the committee studied any of them or exercised any judgment whatever in reference to the various projects. If there is, I would like to get the recommendations which were made by the committee and the reasons for the recommendations.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the committee did in the way of studying the projects. I assume that in all probability the committee did not take up the different projects because the way the bill is now being considered they likely found it impractical to do so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will remember that the rivers and harbors item is for the second time on the War Department appropriation bill. Under the rules of the Senate, in the consideration of the rivers and harbors items there are at least three members taken from the Committee on Commerce, which formerly had jurisdiction of that matter, to sit with and as a part of the Subcommittee on Appropriations and also the general Committee on Appropriations. The general Appropriations Committee had all the estimates. The Budget had picked out a list of items and grouped them together in one sum and made a lump-sum recommendation; the committee's work is to take that recommendation for granted, unless in looking over the special items which it constituted they deem it wise to vary from the Budget recommendation. In other words, the Budget is taken at its best judgment, unless the Congress committees determine otherwise.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will yield to me for another question—because I am going to support his amendment, but I want a little information on it—I want to know where I can look for the proper information if I find that the engineers have recommended $500,000 for Tadpole Inlet, and I want to know why it is recommended and what they expect from it. I am entitled to have that if I am going to vote upon the subject of this extra $29,000,000, or even the $27,000,000. I may not agree that Tadpole Inlet is worth putting in $500,000 extra in dredging it, and so with many other streams, and so forth. I wish some one connected with this legislation would direct me where to find the information upon which I can exercise some judgment as to whether I should vote to increase it to $29,000,000 or reduce it to $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 below the estimates.

Mr. KING. The Senator must not ask for impossibilities.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will give me that information I shall be greatly obliged to him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York if he can advise the Senator from North Dakota as to where he can get the Engineers' report on these different projects—Tadpole Inlet and others?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the only Engineers' report with which I am familiar is the one which is printed in the House hearings, which sets forth the projects and the amounts of money which it is proposed to spend on each project under the $56,000,000 plan. The Budget Bureau itself, in recommending an appropriation of $27,625,760, does not recite the projects upon which that sum in the aggregate is to be spent. It gives a recapitulation of the general purposes for which the $27,000,000 plus is to be spent, but not the list of projects.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I invite the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact, however—and it is a fact, as I am advised—that the engineers went before the Budget Bureau, General Lord and his associates, and submitted a statement asking for over $50,000,000—indeed, seventy-odd million dollars, including certain appropriations for the Mississippi River—and the Budget Bureau had before it whatever data the engineers had before them, and, with that information before the Budget Bureau it made a recommendation of $27,651,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just to make it absolutely accurate—I think I am accurate about it—I do not think the engineers were put in the position of asking for the $56,000,000. I think they were asked to submit a memorandum setting forth what sums, in their judgment, could be advantageously spent on the several authorized projects. The Chief of Engineers first received recommendations on that point from all the district engineer officers in actual charge of the river and harbor work in the different parts of the country. Their recommendations came in from each district. That was toned down in the office of the Chief of Engineers, and finally the Chief of Engineers submitted the list of projects with the sums opposite each project which, in the judgment of the Engineers Corps, could be advantageously expended; but they were asked to do that.

Mr. KING. And with that information before the Budget Bureau that bureau recommended the $27,000,000 plus?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It did.

Mr. McCUMBER. But even in those recommendations, do the engineers or the bureau indicate the usefulness of each of these several projects—the deepening or the widening of Frog Creek, for example? Do they show how it will be necessary, how it will help the Government, how it will tend to increase our commerce, inland or with foreign nations? Really that is the information that we want to get at.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course there is no such information as that. If such information as that were required, that would cleanse and clarify the whole proposition of river and harbor appropriations. If they were required to show wherein a number of these projects would benefit interstate commerce or benefit trade between the States in any way, I apprehend they would be unable to do it. In view of the manner in which the bill is now being presented the Senator from North Dakota will never be able to obtain that kind of information.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will allow me for just a minute, I desire to say that all the information the Senator from North Dakota has suggested should be obtained is found in the report of the Chief of Engineers and has been available ever since last December. It embraces two large volumes, which we have here. It is also found in the hearings before the House committee and in the hearings of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. So the data are all furnished there. Such "frog ponds" and "tadpole creeks," for instance, as New York Harbor will receive an appropriation of something like $7,000,000 under this bill. Such insignificant streams as the Ohio River will also get something like $7,000,000 of this appropriation. Those matters are all set forth in the hearings. I could take time to refer to some of the important ones if the Senator desired, but I think that is hardly necessary.

In the first place, as the bill now stands, the appropriation of $13,000,000 is intended for the maintenance of projects which have been already adopted, upon which work has been prosecuted for years, and which are to be completed. There is also an appropriation of $13,000,000 for inaugurating the work on 35 projects which were selected out of 200 projects which had been recommended by the engineers in December, 1922. Then the work of improving such small streams as I have mentioned constitutes a good part of the additional appropriation of approximately $30,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I repeat that there are undoubtedly projects which ought to be appropriated for, and to which I should not offer any objection, but I think that all Senators must agree that there are projects always being urged and often appropriated for which are indefensible and which it would be impossible to show would be beneficial to commerce should the appropriation be made.

I have examined to some extent the reports to which the able Senator from Florida has referred and they do contain information, but there is not the information contained in them, so far as I have been able to discover, for which the Senator from North Dakota was calling; that is to say, the information which would show wherein and how these different appropriations, with a very few exceptions, would benefit interstate commerce. There are appropriations for streams down which, in my opinion, a duck could not float during a large portion of the year, and as to which it would be impossible to show wherein commerce would be benefited by appropriations for their improvement. There are some benefits to be derived from certain of the projects, of course, and very little argument is needed in their support.

However, I come back, Mr. President, to the point which I desire to stress particularly, but only briefly so far as this particular amendment is concerned. The amount suggested in lieu of the figures now carried by the bill is the amount which was recommended by the Budget Bureau. We must assume that the Budget Bureau made an investigation of this subject, and that it arrived at its conclusion after a fair investigation. If we should assume that the Budget Bureau merely suggested a lump-sum appropriation, without any investigation at all, that would be the severest indictment which could possibly be brought against the entire budget system. We must assume—and I am informed that that is true—that after consulting the engineers, after receiving their reports, the Budget Bureau undertook to determine what amount could be properly expended, and then finally recommended the sum of $27,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator entirely in his general attitude toward the sweeping and general increase in this proposed appropriation, but in his comments on the Budget Bureau and on the principles upon which that bureau operates I am very much interested in the Senator's view on the subject. As I understand, the Senator from Idaho takes the position that Congress and the Board of Engineers ought altogether to subordinate their judgment as to the need for appropriations to the findings which may be made by the Budget Bureau after that bureau makes an examination into the merits of each particular project.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not take that position, Mr. President. I recognize, as I have said time and time again, that the responsibility is entirely here upon Congress; but I do say that where the Budget Bureau has made a recommendation, if there is a project which ought to be included which the bureau did not recommend or if an amount should be included which the bureau failed to include, the reasons and the facts ought to be presented here in the report on this bill to Congress, so that we might know why the exceptions should be made.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator's view on that subject is absolutely sound and correct, but my idea about the Budget Bureau is that the point they are to examine into particularly is the resources of the Government. Of course, the Budget Bureau is an undeveloped agency to a large extent, but it would seem to be its purpose and function to make some estimate of what money the Government will have to expend. It occurs to me, however, that as to river and harbor improvements the Budget Bureau would have to take the reports of some other agency which was better informed than the Budget Bureau could possibly be as to what is needed, and then the Budget Bureau would determine how much they could allow out of the total resources of the Government for that general purpose.

The increase which is carried in this bill of some $29,000,000, or whatever the sum may be, has been inserted in a lump sum, and it comes to us, as the Senator has stated, without any information as to the needs of particular projects. I tried to get here the other day an appropriation of half a million dollars for an archives building for the Government. That was denied because the Budget Bureau has not included it in its estimates.

The Government is deprived of the means of preserving its valuable documents, at a cost of $500,000, to begin with, for the fiscal year, and yet the same body that denies that on the ground of economy authorizes, without any information as to details, an additional lump-sum appropriation for rivers and harbors of $29,000,000, and provided an appropriation in the Agricultural appropriation bill of $500,000 to investigate the food habits of bobcats and other wild animals, although if a man will take a 10-cent piece of raw meat and offer it to a bobcat he can find out what its food habits are.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think I disagree with the Senator from Washington as to his views about the function and the duty of the Budget Bureau, but in the case of the particular bill with which we are now dealing in connection with the item for rivers and harbors we find that the Budget Bureau makes a recommendation of $27,000,000. The bill finally reaches the Senate with more than double that amount, carrying some $56,000,000, making an increase of $29,000,000, and that in a lump sum in an Army appropriation bill.

Mr. President, it may be that we are entirely mistaken as to the work of the Budget system; but, unless it is something more than a scheme to give positions to a few men and place them upon the pay roll and to be utilized during political campaigns, we certainly must pay some respect to the recommendations which it has made, and when we undertake to override its recommendations or to disagree with its recommendations the reasons for doing so ought to be specifically set forth; the justification ought to be made a matter of record, first, in a report, and finally by what may be said here upon the floor.

There is nothing here to advise the Senate as to why the Budget Bureau should be overridden; there is no evidence here to show me why it should be disregarded. I am frank to say that I should not feel compelled to accept the recommendations of the Budget Bureau if the evidence before me seemed not to justify the acceptance of the amount which they recommended.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator would examine the hearings upon this question in the House, I think he would find all the items, the aggregate of which makes up the amount of the appropriation, definitely set out, with the progress that has been made upon the several projects, and with the amounts that are necessary to maintain and continue them.

Mr. BORAH. I have looked at the hearings of the House committee; I have read the debates in the House, and I have tried to examine the matter as best I may; but it is all generalization. We might just as well put in a hundred other projects for the same reasons as the reasons which are assigned there. They constitute the same argument exactly which has been advanced with reference to rivers and harbors at all times.

Now we are up against the proposition that, so far as rivers and harbors are concerned, the Budget law is a dead letter. There is not any more respect paid to the recommendation of the bureau than if the recommendation had been made by some unofficial body; no exception is urged based upon any different kind of a showing than would have been made without any recommendation of this particular bureau. We have now in the bill twice the amount, as I have said, which the Budget Bureau recommended, and if there is anything in the House hearings which goes into the details as to why the amount of the appropriation should be so greatly increased, different from the argument which is always made for a river and harbor appropriation, namely, that it is convenient to have it, I have been unable to discover it. I have a number of the documents before me now, some of which I have examined. But what is the Senator from Missouri going to do with the Budget Bureau in an instance of this kind?

Mr. SPENCER. I think anyone who read the hearings would come to the conclusion that the Budget Bureau made their findings, not because of the emergent character of or the necessity for the items, but because of the necessity, in their judgment, for economy. Where I differ from the Budget Bureau is in this respect, that in the amount recommended by them there is no economy; but there is, as perhaps I may be able to show when the Senator has taken his seat, the grossest extravagance. They are dealing with a subject that needs far more than the appropriation recommended by them gives to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that argument eliminates the existence of the Budget Bureau. If it is to be said that the Budget Bureau simply takes a one-sided or a narrow view of the proposition, which is an inconsiderate proceeding, if their recommendations are to be set aside upon that ground, the same argument will always be advanced here in favor of an appropriation, and we then come back to the question, What is the virtue of a recommendation of the Budget Bureau?

Mr. SPENCER. I understood the Senator to say but a moment ago that, if the evidence which was submitted to him warranted the conclusion in his mind that the Budget Bureau were wrong in their estimate, he would have no hesitation in acting upon his information and not upon the recommendation of the Budget Bureau. That is precisely the condition here.

Mr. BORAH. I remind the Senator of the fact that there is no such evidence, and of the showing that none can be gathered. The argument which is adduced in favor of these appropriations is precisely the same that has been adduced at all times in support of the appropriations for these particular projects. There is no different strain of argument or any different tone of presentation of the entire question. In other words, the Budget Bureau has set aside and disregarded it entirely, and simply says, "We think this ought to be done, and for the same reasons we have had heretofore." The Senator will have to agree with me, then, I think, that so far as rivers and harbors are concerned, the Budget Bureau is unfit to deal with the subject.

Mr. SPENCER. I would not say that, by any means. I think they are entirely competent to deal with it, and I think their recommendation is entitled, as it was given, to the greatest consideration, but in respect to this item I am convinced, as I shall endeavor to show in a few moments, that the Budget Bureau did not begin to appreciate its importance.

Mr. BORAH. How does the Senator account for that?

Mr. SPENCER. I can not tell, except that it is human to err.

Mr. BORAH. It is human to err on the side of appropriations in the Congress of the United States; that is a certainty.

Mr. President, our appropriations this year, I am informed, will run somewhat over $3,000,000,000. Does not the Senator think that the question of economy and the question of the condition of the Treasury ought to be considered under all circumstances? I have no doubt that the Budget Bureau did take those matters into consideration. We have to consider the amount of money in the Treasury, and we should not undertake to appropriate more than is in the Treasury. Indeed, we ought to fall below that if possible; but they have to consider that matter, and they undoubtedly did consider it, and in the light of what they found they investigated these different projects, and came to the conclusion that we could get along with $27,000,000.

Mr. SPENCER. I shall be very fortunate, when the Senator gets through, if I can convince him that the appropriation of $27,000,000 would be ridiculous and that $56,000,000 is not adequate. I do not express the confident hope that that will be the result.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that if the Senator from Missouri gets into operation properly he will convince me that the United States Treasury ought to be located at St. Louis.

Mr. SPENCER. That would be a very good location.

Mr. BORAH. We will have to change our argument to the voter about the Budget Bureau. We can at least afford to be candid and admit that the Budget is only desired for dress occasions. If we increase the appropriation from $27,000,000 to $56,000,000 against the recommendation of the Budget Bureau it will be very difficult ever to maintain an interest upon the part of the people in the Budget Bureau hereafter. Indeed, we have paid very little attention to it, apparently, many times, but this is the most pronounced assault which has been made upon it. I shall now listen to the Senator to see if I have overlooked some of the evidence in this matter as to why there should be an exception.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 82) providing for a joint session of the two Houses at 1 o'clock p. m. to-day for the purpose of receiving a message from the President of the United States, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 82), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 7th day of February, 1923, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the House resolution just received.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that an order be entered that at 10 minutes before 1 o'clock the Senate shall stand in recess until it has had an opportunity to be present in the House to hear the message of the President and then return to its Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be entered.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I do not underestimate the importance of the Budget system or of the recommendations of the Budget Bureau, but I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that in the matter of the rivers and harbors of this country the House differed in principle from the Budget estimate as to what was necessary and, in my judgment, the House was right.

We are playing with our inland waterways. The Budget Bureau is of the opinion that we can carry them along for another year with $27,000,000. What are the facts? In the interior of this country we have a great waterway system which enables us to send the products of the farm and the factory to the seaport practically by gravitation along highways which God has made, and what are we doing? We are, and we have been for years, hauling those products from the Central West over the Appalachian Mountain Range, or the Allegheny Mountain Range, and down again upon the other side, by railroads, at a cost infinitely greater than the waterway transportation would have cost, because of our failure to produce navigation on our inland waterways. This appropriation has to do with navigation.

I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that in 100 years only one main project in our whole inland waterways system has been completed.

Mr. BORAH. How much have we expended in that 100 years?

Mr. SPENCER. We have expended millions of dollars, and millions of that has been wasted because of the inadequacy of the appropriations, as I shall show in a moment. I will take that up right now, if the Senator desires.

Let us take the appropriation for the development of the Mississippi River from Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri. In 1910 Congress said, "We will improve that stretch of river for navigation with an 8-foot channel from Cairo to St. Louis, and with a 6-foot channel from St. Louis to the mouth of the Missouri, and we will undertake a policy which shall provide $21,000,000 in that 12 years, divided into annual appropriations."

If that had been done, the Mississippi would be a navigable stream nine months of the year from Cairo, where the Ohio comes in, northward to where the Missouri River empties in. But the total appropriation for that 12-year period, which ended a little more than a year ago, has not equaled $2,000,000, with the result that we have made appropriations annually inadequate in amount, not sufficient to complete any definite part of the work, and such work is done as is permitted by that limited appropriation, and then the floods come, and winter comes, and what has been done is washed away and destroyed and has to be done over. That is how millions of dollars have been expended, and that is what will be the result if this plan is carried out again this year.

Mr. BORAH. Then, do I understand, as I said a few moments ago, that so far as the rivers and harbors are concerned, the Budget Bureau is utterly incompetent to deal with the subject?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not say it is incompetent. The Senator uses a word stronger than that to which I am willing to subscribe. I say the Budget Bureau fails to estimate the tremendous strategic importance in this country of our inland waterways.

Mr. BORAH. If it fails to estimate it, if it exists, as the Senator has said, it ought to be easily understood that thereby they show their utter unfitness to deal with it.

Mr. SPENCER. I use the language that they are mistaken at this time. The Senator can use whatever language he pleases.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator knows they are much more than mistaken.

Mr. SPENCER. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that in a hundred years there has been but one main project completed in our inland waterways. The project to which I refer is the one for the improvement of the Mississippi from New Orleans to Cairo, where the Ohio empties into the Mississippi. There have been little stretches, subsidiary streams, where projects have been completed; and if this appropriation goes through, my information is the main project on the Ohio, from up around Pittsburgh down to where it empties into the Mississippi, will be completed this year.

Mr. BORAH. That will be done, as I understand, if the appropriation stands at $27,000,000.

Mr. SPENCER. I doubt it.

Mr. BORAH. I can not say; but from my information, which comes from a very reliable source, that would be the fact if the appropriation is but $27,000,000, and that the Budget Bureau had in contemplation.

Mr. SPENCER. Let me call the Senator's attention to what results when we do complete a project. The Senator is doubtless familiar with the little project on the Monongahela, which is a subsidiary coming into the Ohio. The Monongahela and the Allegheny join and make the Ohio. Twelve million dollars were spent in making that river navigable for purposes of coal transportation, with the result that in one year after the navigability of that stream was established $24,000,000 was saved in freight rates through shipment by the water route over what the cost would have been by rail transportation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does he mean that freight was carried or that railroad rates were reduced by reason of the opening of the channel?

Mr. SPENCER. I mean to say that the freight rate on the Monongahela branch was 15 cents a ton by the river and $1.25 a ton by railroad, and that the difference between those two amounts in a single year saved to the shippers and to the American people $24,000,000, twice as much as the entire cost of the project.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me put my question to the Senator again. Does he mean that freight was moved by water or by rail after the completion of the channel?

Mr. SPENCER. It was moved by water. Otherwise the saving could not have been made.

Mr. McCORMICK. Savings are alleged to have occurred, as the Senator will bear in mind, in the case, let us say, of the Hennepin Canal, by reason of the reduction of the freight rates, although practically no freight was moved by the canal.

Mr. SPENCER. In the case of the Monongahela there was an actual carriage of freight. The point I make in regard to that, and leave with the Senate, is this: That whenever we come to the point where we are willing to deal with the inland waterways of our country upon a business basis, and instead of appropriating $56,000,000, which this bill carries, provide a hundred million dollars a year for a certain number of years, we will develop the greatest potential asset for the Mississippi Valley that could be.

What is the Mississippi Valley? Broadly speaking, the Mississippi Valley is that part of our country which extends from the Allegheny Mountains on the east to the Rocky Mountains on the west, from the Gulf of Mexico on the south to the Great Lakes on the north. The Senator knows, I am sure, because of his great study in connection with things of that kind, what that means to this country. Seventy per cent of all the agricultural products of the country come from that section of the country. Fifty-five per cent of the entire population of the United States is domiciled there. Sixty-six per cent of the rural population is domiciled there. The Mississippi Valley comprises 64 per cent of the total area of the United States. It is the great grain-producing section of the Union. Every ton of freight that is carried upon the water saves 20 per cent in transportation cost, as against the cost of carriage by rail.

Mr. BORAH. Where will we come out in that when we reflect that we are guaranteeing the railroads an income?

Mr. SPENCER. That is another question.

Mr. BORAH. It is another question.

Mr. SPENCER. It is another question, and the Senator will agree with me that it does not come in right here.

Mr. BORAH. No; I think not.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Do I understand the Senator from Idaho to maintain that the transportation act guarantees a fixed income to the railroads?

Mr. BORAH. I understand it guarantees a certain percentage of income; yes.

Mr. STANLEY. I am afraid that to a greater or less extent that was the hope, and may have been the intention, of some of the people who wanted the legislation, but I do not believe a careful reading of the provision of the act will warrant so broad an assumption.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps it is a little broad, but how much have we already paid them?

Mr. STANLEY. But in revolving funds and things of that kind we have paid several hundred million dollars. There was $300,000,000 in one revolving fund. We have paid them billions of money in one way and another. I do not wish to be understood as advocating that program. I am of the opinion that the transportation act of 1920 should be revised and amended materially. I am of the opinion that it does not go as far as a flat guaranty outside of brief periods. Just following Government control, for a brief time certain roads were taken care of, but under the broad provisions of the transportation act, while they are allowed to charge so much, there is no guaranty that makes that return assured. Many roads of the United States have the right under the transportation act of 1920 to earn up to a certain amount, say, 5 per cent, before their earnings are pooled in various ways, but if the road does not earn, the Government assumes no obligation to pay it or to enable them to collect it in some other way.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, there can be no difference between myself and the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] or the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who spoke yesterday upon the matter about what it means to this country to take care of its transportation, particularly of that part of our products which are exported. Sixty-nine per cent of all the exportable products of the United States, agricultural and industrial, come from the Mississippi Valley. Eighty per cent of those exportable products, or more than that, could be carried to the seacoast by water if we simply made navigable the streams which are already there.

I refer again for a moment to the Mississippi River from Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri, an essential link in the inland waterway system of the country. In 1910 Congress said, "We will appropriate in a 12-year period $21,000,000 in annual amounts to make that section of our inland waterways navigable." What has been actually done? Those 12 years ended about a year ago, and the aggregate of appropriations, because of the very attitude which the Budget Bureau is taking this year totaled less than $2,000,000—playing with a subject that has to do most vitally with the progress and prosperity of the industrial and agricultural life of the Nation.

May I call the Senator's attention to one other illustration, and then I shall leave them. Congress announced in clear terms what it intended to do when it enacted the railroad law, indicating by the action of both Houses of Congress what was the real purpose of Congress with regard to our inland waterways. It is the purpose which I think the Budget has entirely overlooked. Here is the way it read:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

Now, there is a stream historic in its character which empties into the Mississippi River, which Lewis and Clark explored generations ago—the Missouri. It stretches away up into and through the richest part of the country. What did Congress say about it? In 1912 Congress adopted a policy by which they said with regard to the Missouri River, "We will appropriate $20,000,000 for making the Missouri navigable from Kansas City down to where it empties into the Mississippi." There was to be expended $2,000,000 in each year. On the strength of that policy the people of Kansas City subscribed over $1,000,000 and bought barges and boats to facilitate the carrying of the freight which was to be carried when the river became navigable. Not one single year since 1912 has that $2,000,000 appropriation been made, and it is not provided even in the $56,000,000 in the present bill which has been appropriated so far as the House of Representatives is concerned. Three hundred and fifty miles of that river are navigable. Fifty miles of it needs attention with reference to revetment of the banks and dredging of the channels, for that 50 miles locks the entire river from Kansas City to St. Louis.

We have been playing with the subject of our inland waterways. Mr. President, if any other nation in the world had waterways such as we have, would there be the cavil and the hesitation about putting into them all that was necessary, for what?—to make them navigable so that barges could carry the freight that is ready to be carried at the cheaper freight rates.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Federal Government spent nearly half a billion dollars constructing the Panama Canal, but no sooner was the canal built than obstructions to our water-borne commerce were placed there and American ships must pay a toll of $1.20 per ton for transit. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] during the present Congress introduced a bill to repeal that provision of the law charging American ships for transit through the canal, and it passed the Senate. Did the Senator from Missouri vote for that bill?

Mr. SPENCER. I can not tell the Senator whether I was here when that vote was taken.

Mr. ASHURST. A Senator who could make such an eloquent speech in behalf of free and uninterrupted commerce as the Senator is now making it occurs to me would have voted for free and uninterrupted commerce for American vessels through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I say that there can be no difference on this floor about the inadequacy of the railroads to carry the freight of the country. In my State and in the adjoining States in the last few years, before the war mainly, there was grain on the farms rotting by the hundreds of thousands of bushels because it could not be transported to the market. During the past summer, with some of my associates here, I saw the waterways of France and of Germany, many of them insignificant compared with the great avenues of transportation which day and night are flowing through the very center of our Nation. But every foot of those foreign waterways was navigable, every mile was carrying the freight of those countries at the cheap transportation rates by water, while the United States, with a potential power unequalled in the world in inland navigation, is playing with the subject.

The Senator from Idaho said something about the enormous amount of the appropriation, $56,000,000. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it is but little more in available funds than we have had for the last two or three years, and that sum has been absolutely inadequate. For the fiscal year 1920 we appropriated $12,000,000, but we had $58,800,000 available in the Treasury to be added to the $12,000,000, so that in 1920 there was available $70,800,000. In 1921 we appropriated $15,000,000, but there was available in the Treasury $37,500,000 which, added to the $15,000,000, made an available fund in 1921 of $52,500,000. That Treasury available fund is now gone. There is approximately a little over a million dollars left in the Treasury as available to meet contingencies or emergencies, so that the $56,000,000 in 1923 would not give us as much money as was available there in 1920.

The Senator from Idaho also spoke about a lump sum as against a definite appropriation for a vast number of projects,

There is merit in what the Senator said, as there is always merit in whatever he says, but I venture to say that as a Nation we get a better result by letting trained experts deal with the division of a lump sum than to attempt to do it by bringing upon the floor of the Senate a selection from a vast number of projects where trades and personal inclinations and personal associations and geographical situations are very apt to cloud, if they do not destroy, the judgment of the individual Senator when he comes to vote upon it. We can not in the necessity of the case know as much about individual projects as do those who are devoting their life work to them.

Mr. President, $56,000,000 for a certain number of projects is proposed. Not a single project was recommended in 1919 or in 1920. When projects come up for consideration—and every one of them has to do with the making of some stream navigable which would enable the products of the farm and factory to be carried cheaper than by rail—the department divides them into two classes: First, those which are important and strategic, and, second, those which are desirable. Of more than 200 projects which the experts have determined were strategic and important, 35 have been incorporated in the $56,000,000.

There were added in 1922 not much more than 12 per cent of those projects which are necessary for the transportation of American agricultural and industrial projects; all the others were laid aside. I said we were playing with our inland waterways, and we are. If we in this country ever come to the point where we develop our waterways economically and systematically and regularly, according to a plan that shall be determined upon and not varied from, our transportation resources will be quadrupled, and at a cost for every pound of freight that is carried of from 20 per cent upward less than rail transportation.

I said or intimated a moment ago what is true, that the railroads, let alone the excessive cost of railroad transportation, are unable to carry the freight of this country from the place where it originates to the place where it is ready for the market or for exportation. Every principle of economy, of efficiency, I was about to add of patriotism, in the development of the prosperity and progress of our Nation stands back of an adequate appropriation for the inland waterways of these United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, the Budget Bureau took into consideration all the matters which the Senator from Missouri is so well presenting to the Senate, but that it eliminated, in its conception of what ought to be done, a vast number of projects which it was believed would never benefit commerce in any way. Has the Senator from Missouri looked over the list of projects which has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. SPENCER. I have, and I do not think the Senator from Idaho is quite accurate in saying that a single project was eliminated because it would not benefit the transportation problem of this country. As I am informed, that those projects would confer a benefit was conceded, but the reduction and the elimination were based upon an entirely different reason.

Mr. BORAH. What was that?

Mr. SPENCER. It was that, no matter how necessary or desirable such projects might be, it is better to wait; and there is merit in that argument. The only difference I have with the Budget Bureau is that the Budget Bureau thinks that the advantage of waiting is greater than the advantage of now completing necessary projects, while I think the economy would be greater in completing necessary projects than in waiting. If this appropriation of $56,000,000 shall wait, the appropriation proposed to be substituted would not complete any project unless it be the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to the Mississippi.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Missouri says that he has looked over this list, which is headed—

Amounts stated in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers as those that can be profitably expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, for maintenance and improvement of river and harbor works.

That was put into the RECORD of January 25, 1923. Do I understand that the Senator from Missouri is prepared to say that all the projects named in that list are such projects as would be beneficial to commerce if they were completed?

Mr. SPENCER. Without exception, every one of them would be beneficial to commerce if completed.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I wish now to insert in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, this list of projects, which is a reprint from the RECORD of January 25, 1923.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if my information is correct, some of these projects are utterly valueless from the commercial standpoint. A number of them have been debated at length upon the floor of the Senate heretofore. Some of the most absurd projects have been presented here as being worthy of appropriations, and they are now back here again. As I understand, it was with a desire to get rid of some of those projects that the Budget Bureau made the report which it did.

Secondly, Mr. President, as I understand also, if the $27,000,000 shall be allowed, practically the same amount will go to the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers that will be devoted to their improvement under the greater appropriation. How much difference would there be?

Mr. SPENCER. My understanding is that under the Budget estimate the Ohio would get not to exceed $2,000,000 instead of $7,000,000 and the Missouri and the Mississippi would get practically nothing. The harbors, which come first, would themselves exhaust the Budget estimate and the rivers get nothing.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I am of the opinion that the Senator from Missouri, in the presentation of his view of the matter, is not outside of the views of the Budget Bureau itself; that they were not undertaking to limit or to cripple or to discontinue the improvement of the streams concerning which the Senator has been speaking; but the Senator from Missouri must know—at least, I feel that I know—that interwoven in this scheme of river improvement are streams, or what are called streams, and bayous and lakes and other water courses the improvement of which will never be beneficial to the plan which the Senator has in mind, and will never be helpful in the enlargement or building up of commerce. It was to get rid of such projects that the Budget Bureau made the report which it did.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator—for I happen to know about this, it being in my own State—that where the Missouri River runs through Saline and Howard Counties it makes a great bend. The river now is within 200 yards of cutting its way through and eliminating that bend, with the result that if those 200 yards are cut through by the river the rapidity of its current will make it absolutely unnavigable except at tremendous cost. I know that the engineer department recognize the emergency in that situation, but they have not the money to protect it. It was 400 yards a year ago when I called attention to it. Now it is 200 yards. The fact that it will destroy the water supply of two counties and will do a good deal of damage otherwise is incidental to the damage which will be inflicted upon the navigability of the entire river.

Mr. BORAH. How much would it cost to remedy that situation?

Mr. SPENCER. I suppose it would cost a couple of hundred thousand dollars—perhaps $300,000—to protect the river at that point. The engineers say, "Yes; that improvement is necessary, but that is only one point out of hundreds of points where improvements should be made; and that is all the money we have; we can not do it." I say to the Senate that the $56,000,000 will hardly enable them—in fact, will not enable them—to take care of necessary maintenance and improvement of navigable streams. The amount seems large because the Senator puts it in contrast with the $27,000,000 recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, but, as I showed, it is not as large an amount as was available in 1920. It is grossly inadequate, rather than being superabundant.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the interesting part of this controversy to me is that all these facts must have been known to the engineers and to the Budget Bureau.

Mr. SPENCER. Here is what happened so far as the engineers are concerned: First, there came the estimates from the district engineers who were in charge of the different projects throughout the Union, who estimated, I presume with care and conscience, what they thought was necessary for the projects under their charge. Those estimates totaled millions of dollars more than the Engineer Department here could see the possibility of obtaining. So they culled them, eliminated desirable projects, reduced estimates for maintenance, and did everything they could to cut down the amount until they reduced it to $56,000,000 as a minimum. Then it went to the Budget Bureau. The Budget Bureau is looking not only at inland waterways but is looking at every other department of the Government, and they said, "No; considering the state of the Union and of the Treasury of the United States and the needs of other departments, we are not going to give $56,000,000; we will give $27,000,000."

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator undertake to say that the Budget Bureau, without rhyme or reason, simply said, "We will not give this because we do not desire to give it; there is no reason for refusing it; these projects ought to have the money, but we will simply, arbitrarily and without rhyme or reason, cut this proposed appropriation in two"?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not say that, because I do not know; but I do say to the Senator it looks that way.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if it looks that way, it is a very severe impeachment of the whole scheme of the Budget.

Mr. SPENCER. The Budget Bureau is comparatively new. I do not believe, and I doubt if the Senator believes, that the Budget Bureau have as yet any adequate vision of what the inland waterways mean to the Central West.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will talk to some of the members of the bureau, he will find that they think they have.

Mr. SPENCER. That may be so.

Mr. BORAH. And that they have made an honest endeavor to arrive at a conclusion in regard to it. They have certainly undertaken to get a proper conception of the situation; but, according to the Senator, they are entirely incompetent to deal with it.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not say that. The Senator has put words in my mouth several times.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator does not say that, but he proves it.

Mr. SPENCER. To the mind of the Senator from Idaho, perhaps, but not to mine.

Mr. BORAH. I would submit it, then, to a Missouri jury.

Mr. SPENCER. I will say to the Senator he would lose.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Missouri has had great experience along that line. There is, however, no telling what they would do.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not criticize the Budget Bureau; I merely say that they have no adequate conception of the importance of the subject of rivers and harbors. The Senator from Idaho has been on committees and subcommittees again and again in considering appropriation bills, and he knows what deference is paid to every recommendation of the Budget Bureau; but here and there a subject develops about which, perhaps, the Congress knows more than does the Budget Bureau, and in such cases the committee has said: "The Budget Bureau have not appreciated this project; that is an inadequate appropriation; that must be changed." This is an illustration of that. Such instances are not frequent; every deference, as should be the case, is paid to the recommendations of the Budget Bureau, but, as the Senator intimated a few moments ago, when a man's judgment and conscience are clear that the Budget Bureau, not so much from incompetence, as the Senator repeats, but because of a lack of appreciation of the importance of the project, fails to grasp what it means to this country, what is the duty of Congress?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator and I are merely using different terms to express exactly the same thing. I say they are incompetent, the Senator says they are inadequate.

Mr. SPENCER. I did not say they were inadequate.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator said they were unable to appreciate the situation.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is right; we agree perfectly.

Mr. BORAH. If that is not incompetence, then I do not understand the English language; but that is immaterial. There is one thing certain, if the Senator from Missouri is correct then so far as the Budget Bureau is concerned with reference to rivers and harbors we may eliminate it from consideration hereafter.

Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any other Senator who desires to discuss this matter.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. If there be a reform which the present administration has adopted which met with general approval, it was the establishment of the Budget. In this instance, however, we find an appropriation increased in the sum of $28,964,150 over and above the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget. Some Senators manifest considerable indignation over such an unwarranted increase, but instead of arousing indignation it ought to arouse, instead, their risibilities.

This river and harbor provision of this bill was prepared to pass. This Congress is officially in extremis and it can do no more fitting thing as a capstone to its discreditable record than to reach its hands into the Treasury and squander $28,964,150 of the money of already heavily burdened taxpayers. One discreditable feature of this item is that this unnecessary expenditure is included in the military appropriation bill.

The President of the United States, I believe, would veto this item if he could separate this excess above the Budget recommendations and approve as to the amount actually needed. The Budget officials know how much money is necessary, and they have estimated for that amount, to wit, $27,625,170.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is wasting his time in opposing this measure. This bill is loaded to pass. The "skids are greased" so that this item will easily slide through. Not 20 votes can be mustered against it under any circumstances. I desire to vote for the Army appropriation bill, but I fear that to do so I must vote for an excess expenditure of nearly $29,000,000. The Budget cracks and collapses when the pork barrel rolls over it.

While I can not speak for the President, I know that he wishes and hopes that Republican Senators will vote against this enormous and unnecessary excess appropriation.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if time permits I shall call attention to a number of projects for which appropriations are carried in the rivers and harbors items found in the pending bill. I shall do this for the purpose of showing the lack of merit upon the part of many of the rivers and harbors projects and the enormous waste of money which has resulted from the improvident, not to say indefensible, measures passed by previous Congresses dealing with rivers and harbors.

Under the commerce clause of the Constitution, which merely gives to the Federal Government the authority to "regulate commerce," measures have been enacted by Congress which have called for more than $1,300,000,000 to "improve," as it has been said, and "maintain" hundreds of small streams and rivulets and bayous and creeks and so-called rivers and navigable streams, and indentations along the seacoast, which have been called harbors. It is too late to raise the question of the constitutionality of many of the acts of Congress dealing with so-called rivers and harbors projects. The precedents established by numerous legislative enactments are too numerous to be challenged, and even if they could be successfully challenged the inclination, indeed the determination, to follow such precedents and to continue enormous appropriations—under the guise of "regulating commerce"—for streams which are unnavigable and for so-called "harbors" that have no commerce is so powerful that all efforts in opposition thereto are foredoomed to defeat.

Congress has proceeded in the legislation which I have referred to upon the theory that the Federal Government owned all the streams, great and small, all the creeks and rivulets and swamps and rivers, whether navigable or unnavigable, to be found within the various States of the Union. And the view seems to have obtained that the authority of Congress over the so-called watercourses was paramount and supreme, indeed exclusive, even though such streams and lakes and rivulets and creeks were intrastate in character. The view also seems to have obtained that the power to "regulate commerce" was a mandate to create commerce, and was authority for the Federal Government to provide waterways in order to create competition with rail or other modes of transportation. Mr. President, in my opinion the clause in the Constitution referred to has been perverted and legislation has been enacted ostensibly under that provision of the Constitution which has been an infringement upon the rights of the States and in contravention of the spirit and indeed the letter of the Constitution.

The regulation of commerce does not warrant the spending the millions of dollars by the Federal Government, wrung from the people by taxation, to construct waterways, dig out little rivulets and streams, purely provincial and local in character, or to construct revetments and other improvements upon streams which are primarily important to private riparian owners. Many of the streams which have been drains upon the Treasury of the United States were not navigable and have not been and can not be made navigable in the true and proper sense. They may have served one or a very limited number of individuals occasionally to carry a few logs or small pieces of timber for a few miles, but they were not carriers of commerce, nor do they serve the public.

An examination of the hundreds of projects for which appropriations have been made by the Federal Government will conclusively demonstrate that they can not by the wildest stretch of imagination be regarded as instrumentalities of commerce or within the control of the Federal Government, but I shall, if time permits, discuss this point later in my remarks.

I pause here to allude to the strong and trenchant language of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who has just characterized this bill. He denominated it as a "pork-barrel" bill and a species of "graft." Undoubtedly his language will be resented by some who look upon river and harbor bills as most important and highly beneficial legislation.

Doubtless the Senator from Arizona perceives the difference between legitimate appropriations for the regulation of commerce and appropriations which are devoted to furnishing employment to a large number of individuals who spend their time in cleaning out little brooks and creeks and rivulets and in wasting money upon streams that carry no commerce. I have been somewhat curious to know where the term "pork barrel" arose. It does not need a lexicographer to tell us its meaning, nor a diagram to point out all of its implications. It suggests legislation which is not for the public welfare and the general good, but rather measures which are selfish and special and local or provincial, though they may affect various parts of the country. The idea suggested by the words "pork-barrel" legislation is that the legislation desired is promoted by combinations of various groups or sections; that it is not general, but selfish and improper and may not be defended upon high moral grounds. I shall not attempt to controvert the statements of the Senator from Arizona or further examine them. I shall only ask Senators and those who are interested in this subject to examine the multitude of projects, referred to in the report of the engineers of the Army, which are to be the beneficiaries, so far as inanimate objects may be benefited, of the stupendous appropriation carried by this bill for so-called rivers and harbors. In my opinion the record will demonstrate that much of this sum so appropriated will be wasted and applied to so-called rivers and harbors projects which can not under any proper interpretation of the Constitution claim Federal aid.

But, of course, no efforts to reduce the appropriation of more than $56,000,000 carried by this bill will succeed. The recommendations of the Budget Bureau were ruthlessly brushed aside in another important legislative body, and this body will treat such recommendations in the same manner. I do not recall, no matter how earnest and vigorous the attacks upon rivers and harbors bills, that the slightest success attended such attacks. The lines to be broken were too strong and the forces defending too strongly intrenched.

So the motion from the Senator from Idaho to follow the Budget recommendation will obtain but few votes in this body.

As I now remember, there have been one or two successful filibusters against rivers and harbors bills, but the temporary victory only postponed the evil hour and subsequent Congresses promptly made appropriations to meet the demands of the proponents of these measures. I remember that a distinguished Republican Senator from Montana [Mr. Thomas H. Carter] a number of years ago denounced a reported rivers and harbors bill, and after holding the floor for many hours succeeded in defeating it.

But it must be conceded that the rule has been that public buildings measures and rivers and harbors bills have cut their way triumphantly and remorselessly through all opposition.

The Senator from Arizona, using language which so strongly appeals to all classes, declares that the "skids have been greased" for the passage of this bill, and that not 20 votes will be recorded against it. That is quite likely. It apparently is a very popular measure and will speedily receive the approval of the Senate. I submit, however, that it would be wiser if the Members of this body would follow the recommendations of the Budget and reduce this appropriation to the figures submitted by the bureau. A careful examination was made of the meritorious projects and of their needs. The engineers submitted to the Budget Bureau the data which they possessed, and after calm and dispassionate consideration approximately twenty-eight millions of dollars were reported as the proper appropriation for the next fiscal year.

Mr. President, I am reminded by a Senator who is near me that the President of the United States will present to Congress within a few minutes a message upon an important matter. As the Senate must meet with the House of Representatives and a quorum is to be called before Senators proceed to the House I shall not detain the Senate longer, but if opportunity affords shall obtain the floor before a vote is taken upon the passage of the bill.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The hour having arrived at which, under the order previously made, the Senate is to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to receive a communication from the President of the United States, the Senate will stand in recess and proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms and by the Presiding Officer and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The address of the President of the United States this day delivered before the two Houses of Congress appears in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, beginning at page 3212.

At 1 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m. the Senate returned to its Chamber and the Presiding Officer (Mr. Moses) resumed the chair.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend the act creating the World War Foreign Debt Commission. I ask that the bill may be read at length so that it will go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce a bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator asks that the bill be read for the information of the Senate, and it will be read.

The bill (S. 4497) to amend the act creating the World War Foreign Debt Commission was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first proviso of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922, is amended to read as follows:

"Provided, That the settlement of indebtedness of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the United States, recommended by the commission and approved by the President, as set forth by him in a message presented to Congress on February 7, 1923, is hereby approved and authorized, and settlements similar in terms with other governments indebted to the United States as set forth in this section are hereby authorized to be made subject to the approval of the President."

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. BROOKHART. I announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word or two about this matter. I think it is very important. At the same time, I scarcely think it is necessary, perhaps, to extend the debate on it.

Senators have expressed this morning some anxiety about what would be done with this appropriation of $56,000,000, as if they were not advised as to the merits of the various items which would consume it. I have heretofore mentioned the fact that the report of the Chief of Engineers for the fiscal year 1922 has been before Congress since December, and that report covers all the items which have been heretofore adopted by Congress—and which are under improvement and under maintenance—and it shows the amount of commerce taken care of by each, the amount of commerce moving over the waterways and through the harbors that are mentioned in the two volumes of this report. Then, the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House give the testimony of General Taylor, who is familiar with all these projects and has been closely connected with the improvement of rivers and harbors for a great many years and know precisely what is needed, what is meritorious and what is not, and states his reasons therefor.

It would take a good deal of time to recite all these details, and I am not going to attempt to do it. I called attention yesterday to the statement of General Taylor before the Committee on Appropriations, which in a condensed way outlined precisely what was contemplated by the Chief of Engineers in connection with the recommendations which the engineers have made looking to the improvement and maintenance of these rivers and harbors.

It appears from that statement that about $13,000,000 of the appropriation will be required for the maintenance of projects already completed—projects that were adopted many years ago, projects upon which millions of dollars have been spent, and which unless maintained will go to pieces and the money will be very largely wasted. A certain amount is required each year to take care of the projects so that there will not be a waste of the money, and that amount is spent only in cases where the commerce is actually moving over the improved river or harbor. Those items are all shown in the reports of the engineers and in the list which they furnish giving the names and the locations and the various details indicating where this money for maintenance is required and will be spent.

We can not ignore the fact that unless these projects, which are already completed, are maintained, eventually Congress will be asked for appropriations for further improvements, various channels will be filled up, various kinds of depreciation will take place from time to time, and in order to avoid future appropriations to improve projects which have been completed and are serving the commerce of the country to-day, and in order that the money which has already been spent may not go for naught, it is necessary to provide certain funds for maintaining the channels and the improvements which have already been completed.

That takes about $13,000,000 of this appropriation. Thirteen million dollars will be required to begin the work on the 35 projects which were adopted by the act of 1922. It will be recalled, and General Taylor points out, that for years past, and particularly during the war, we neglected these improvements, Pressure was brought to bear upon our resources from other directions. We had to prepare for and conduct a great war, and our whole financial strength was required to take care of the operations on our part and to furnish financial help to those associated or allied with us in that critical and distressing situation.

We neglected the improvement of our rivers and harbors in the meantime. For several years we appropriated very little more than was necessary to maintain the projects which had already been adopted. We got into the practice of appropriating lump sums and leaving the matter to the engineers themselves, who were familiar with all these projects, who were acquainted with the necessity and the commercial justification in each instance, and who knew of the difficulties involved, and who could estimate the cost in each instance with intelligence and accuracy. We left it to them to take care of the expenditure of these appropriations to meet the greatest need and to serve the best purpose, and in fullest measure take care of our commercial requirements respecting these facilities for transportation. They are acquainted with the situation all over the country, and in what better hands could we place the expenditure of this amount, which has been passed upon in advance by Congress, because we have not made a lump-sum appropriation just as a guess. Before making any appropriation at all, we had all the facts brought before us; we had the reports of the engineers; we had the testimony in the hearings; and we knew, in a broad way, just where the money we were providing for was to be expended; but we left the detail of the expenditure in the charge of those experts who are capable officials and who know the situation, because it is their duty and their work to know it, and they are best informed and best capable of making the proper and wise allotment of these sums in order to serve the best public purposes.

We declined for years—from 1919 until 1922—to adopt any new projects at all. In the meanwhile we provided for some surveys in our legislation, for investigations and examinations, and those were made. The engineers have made reports from time to time in pursuance of the provisions for surveys made in these appropriation bills requiring them to make examinations of various projects specified and named in those bills, and they have done that work and made reports, and recommended favorably some 200 projects throughout the whole country. I think there was only one instance, in all my experience here, where Congress provided for a project not recommended by the engineers, and that was a case up in Michigan some years ago, where Congress adopted a project which had not been approved by the engineers. I do not believe there is any other instance in the whole history of this work since I have been here, and I do not know but that it would extend clear back to the beginning, where Congress adopted a project not favorably reported by the engineers, and we have been doing this work for something like a hundred years.

In my judgment, Mr. President, no money is expended out of the Treasury of the United States for any purpose that is so thoroughly safeguarded as the money we expend on rivers and harbors. You may call it "pork barrel," you may try to discredit it; you may call it a trading proposition, or what you may, but there is absolutely no instance where money is appropriated by Congress and expended out of the Treasury of the country that is so thoroughly protected and safeguarded as the money which is appropriated for rivers and harbors. Why do I say that? Because, as I have said, the first step is to provide for an examination by the engineers. They will not voluntarily recommend, they will not venture to suggest, even where they have the information, the adoption of any project whatever, and they only act when they are instructed to act by Congress. One house or the other causes an item to be put into a river and harbor bill providing for a survey or examination of a river or a harbor in some locality, and when Congress agrees to that and passes the bill with that item in it, then the Chief of Engineers, of course, has his duty to perform. He sends it down to the district engineer, and the district engineer proceeds to make that survey or examination.

It will be borne in mind that the engineers are officers of the United States Army. They hold life positions, subject to good behavior. They are not subject to any wire pulling or hauling or political influence. They do not hold their positions at the instance of any Member of the Senate or the House, or under any conditions that make them subject to any sort of influence. Their business is to determine the merit of each proposal from the standpoint of the Government. They look over the situation. They see what the commerce is, and what the prospective commerce will be. They see what the commercial justification for the improvement would be. They determine what will be the cost to the Government if they undertake the improvement, and they report all that. That district engineer's report comes up to the division engineer in his district. The division engineer examines that report and either agrees with the district engineer or reports against it or modifies it in some form, and it goes from him to the Chief of Engineers. That report then goes from the Chief of Engineers to a Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, composed of seven officers, none below the rank of colonel, as I remember, certainly not below that of captain, experienced engineers and officers who are acquainted with these problems and have had to deal with them for years and years.

That board considers the reports which are sent up, and the various indorsements on them, and after that board examines all the papers, maps, plats, and all the data which have been furnished it, they may say, "We are not impressed that the Government ought to undertake this improvement." They then give notice to all parties interested and give them an opportunity to be heard. If they can be convinced that the Government ought to make the improvement, that their report ought to be favorable, very well and good; but those in favor of it have to make a strong showing before them, and must satisfy them as to the merits of the proposition. They must be shown the commercial justification for the expenditure the reports show the Government must make when they undertake that project.

Finally the board reports to the Chief of Engineers, and I think the Chief of Engineers usually adopts the report of the board, because they have gone into the details. The Chief of Engineers reports to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, and then for the first time do we know the result of this undertaking, beginning with an authorization for a survey by Congress. If the report of the engineers is favorable, after consideration and study and investigation by the district engineer, then by the division engineer, then by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, then by the Chief of Engineers, passing it on up to the Secretary of War, it is a question for Congress to decide whether in a subsequent act it will adopt the project thus reported on or will not. Congress has never, except in the one instance I mentioned of a case in Michigan, I believe, adopted a project which was reported unfavorably by the Chief of Engineers in pursuance of these various steps I have indicated.

I would like to know where you will find in any department or bureau of this Government such a thorough study and examination and unprejudiced and unbiased report made as a basis of action by Congress. After that report is in, if it is favorable, then it may be that Congress will still not adopt the project, and in a great many instances they have not done so. As I have just stated, out of 200 favorable reports made by the engineers in 1922, proceeding in the various steps I have indicated, Congress selected 35 as the most highly meritorious projects and adopted them—35 out of 200. We have not had a bill since then, and there is no bill now pending providing for any new project. The Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House does not propose to submit a bill at this session to take care of any new projects at all.

This appropriation is intended to carry about $13,000,000 for maintenance of old projects, completed heretofore, and $13,000,000 for beginning work on new projects which were adopted by Congress in 1922, after the various stages I have indicated had been gone through, and after a favorable report by the engineers, and after both Houses of Congress, with the advice and counsel of the engineers developing the merit of these various proposals in the various hearings, decided, "These 35 are of prime importance, and we will adopt them and postpone action on the others which have already been favorably reported on by the engineers."

What is the use of adopting these 35 projects if we do not appropriate some money to do the work on them, to go on with them? We may not necessarily complete them now, but we certainly should begin the work now.

That is contemplated in the bill. We simply stultify ourselves if we said in 1922 that we adopt these projects and authorize their improvement and agree that the improvements ought to be made, and then in 1923 refuse to appropriate the money to do the work. That is what the proposition means. If we reduce the appropriation from $56,000,000 to $27,000,000, we can not go on with the work in any orderly, economical, and proper way. We may take care of the maintenance provisions, but we can not go on regularly with the improvements. Some of these are very important projects. Let me mention one or two of them.

For instance, here is Plymouth Harbor, Mass. That is a small project, amounting to only $51,000 to provide for facilities in the harbor which were destroyed by the work done for the Pilgrims' Centennial. In carrying out the work done there they practically destroyed the harbor, and the $51,000 is one-half the amount required to restore the facilities. The other half will be put up by the State of Massachusetts. There was a harbor of merit as to commerce destroyed when we undertook to join in the celebration there. The State is to put up half of it, and the Federal Government is to put up the other half, $51,000.

Mr. NORRIS. How was it destroyed?

Mr. FLETCHER. The details are not given. I am referring to General Taylor's statement appearing at page 163 of the hearings before the Senate committee. I could look into that somewhat further. Perhaps he went into it more in detail before the House committee, but that was the statement made before the Senate committee.

In carrying out the work done there they have practically destroyed the harbor, and the $51,000 is one-half of the amount required to restore the facilities. That was General Taylor's statement before the Senate committee. Evidently in carrying on the work preparing for the celebration the damage was done.

Mr. NORRIS. The question naturally arises in my mind—and it is very important now—how was it destroyed, because if having naval vessels going in or having a sort of jubilee would destroy it, probably it is not wise to keep it up if it were so easily destroyed. I think it is important to know how it was that the harbor was destroyed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not give any more details than are given in the testimony before the committee. I can not state now the details, but will look it up later and see if anything further was given in the testimony before the House committee. It may be that further information with reference to it appears in the report. I just happened to have before me the statement of General Taylor before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

Another new project was what is known as the New York and New Jersey channels, which is a project for the deepening of the channels north, west, and south of Staten Island, the channels surrounding Staten Island. The channel now has a project depth of 25 feet and the proposal is to deepen it to 30 feet. Now look at the commerce that is involved there. The commerce in the channel amounts to between 20,000,000 and 30,000,000 tons a year. On that channel are situated a number of oil refineries, copper reduction works, and other large industrial plants.

The chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], asked General Taylor:

What is the cost of that project?

General TAYLOR. The cost of the project will be in the neighborhood of $11,000,000. The amount carried in this bill is $1,500,000. That is for the first year's work.

That project has been adopted. Congress said: "We intend to go on with the improvements." It ought to be improved. The commerce is there to justify it. The engineers now say if they do the work they must have $1,500,000 this year. How can anyone defend a vote that refuses to appropriate the money for that purpose?

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator on that point if it necessarily follows, if the amendment is agreed to, that the work can not be done?

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely. It would have to be cut down. If it is reduced, the engineers might not allot to that project more than $500,000. The engineers would have to readjust all of their estimates and perhaps leave out entirely those which are not of commanding importance.

Mr. NORRIS. The engineers' adjustment of the amount necessary to carry on the work of the 35 projects includes $1,500,000 for this project?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose there are a good many others that do not need that much money. This is one of the most important of them all, is it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. I might say to the Senator from Nebraska that in and about the harbor of New York over $7,000,000 of the $56,000,000 would be allotted. We can not say that that harbor does not require or need this sort of improvement. We can not say that the commerce there does not justify the expenditure. We must take care of the situation. There will be something over $7,000,000 spent in the vicinity of New York Harbor, and there will also be $7,000,000 on the Ohio River.

We adopted years ago the project on the Ohio River to build the dams there. During the war we practically laid aside that work, because, in the first place, it was too expensive and the difficulty of getting material and labor, hampered as we were, was such that we practically held up the work there. That work ought to be completed. We have all agreed on that. Congress has over and over again declared in favor of the importance of the Ohio River project. The engineers are in a position to spend between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 this year on the Ohio River, and they will soon have the work completed. This bill takes care of that project for the coming year. If we reduce the appropriation any at all, the engineers would have to make a proportionate reduction on the Ohio River, in all probability.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. NEW. What would require a lessening of the estimate of $7,000,000 to be expended on the Ohio River, provided the amendment prevails?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that that is going to depend upon how the engineers will be able to work out the problems. They would then have to readjust all of their estimates and figures. Having so much money, they would have to cut their suit according to their cloth. What reduction would take place on the Ohio can probably be arrived at in a very simple way. Eight million dollars is to $56,000,000 as so many million dollars would be to $42,000,000 or $27,000,000 or whatever the amount might be. It would have to be calculated in that way I presume. The engineers would have to determine that, and certainly they would have to reduce their constructive plans and their work on the Ohio River if we did not give them the full amount of money necessary to carry it on. There are no ifs and ands about it. They can not take things out of the air and off of the trees and bushes and put them together and build dams across rivers. It takes money to do that. If we deny them all the money they need, they can not build the dams.

Mr. NEW. I do not want to trespass on the Senator's time, but I have something to say with reference to that matter. I shall not, however, interrupt him at present.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator. I am anxious to give the Senator the best information I can on the subject. I can not specify what particular projects would be entirely neglected or postponed; that is to say, when the engineers are given only $27,000,000 or $37,000,000, or when any reduction is made from $56,000,000, they would have then to determine whether they would do any work at all on certain projects. They might quit certain projects entirely and not spend a cent on them, and put the money on the Ohio River. They might practically concentrate their work in that way on New York Harbor and the Ohio River. The $14,000,000 allotted to those two projects might be spent there, but they are not likely to do that, I think. I imagine what they would do would be perhaps to postpone any work on some existing projects already adopted and perhaps under way, awaiting further appropriations, and spend the money where they thought there is the greatest necessity for it; or else they may try to apportion it over the entire number of projects as named in the hearings. At any rate, they have to determine what is best to do with the money that they have, and that is sure to be a very difficult problem. We know now what they will do with it if they are given the full amount, because they have said it before the committees and in their report. We know exactly what they would do with the $56,000,000, but we do not know what they can do if we reduce it to $27,000,000 or $37,000,000 or make any other reduction.

With reference to the project in New York I read from the hearings further, as follows:

Senator WADSWORTH. That is the amount that would be allotted to that project?

General TAYLOR. That is the amount which is included in the items which make up $56,000,000. We have been urged very strongly by the commercial interests around Staten Island that that amount is wholly insufficient. They believe that there should be at least $3,000,000 allotted to it, and I presume there will be very strong arguments made. I do not know just what the final amount recommended will be, but if the full amount of $56,000,000 is allowed, it will probably not be less than $1,500,000, and possibly more, if we can find other places that can be reduced without seriously interfering with the other projects.

If we do not give them $56,000,000 they probably will use $500,000 or they might not begin the work at all, but use the money somewhere else.

So it is all the way through the projects. The extension of the sea wall at Galveston Harbor is another very important piece of work that ought to be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator about that work. How far has it progressed? What, if any, would be the danger that would be brought about if the entire amount asked for was not expended next year?

Mr. FLETCHER. If they do not complete it, a storm may come up and completely destroy all they have done. They have only built a part of the wall. It can be readily understood that where a wall that is intended to protect a great harbor is only partially completed and a storm comes like the one that did the damage before, it would sweep around the end of the incomplete wall and destroy the whole work.

Mr. NORRIS. That might happen, anyway, if the wall was completed, because even when it is completed it will have an end and the water could go around it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It might, but it is not at all probable. Here is what General Taylor had to say about the Galveston project:

General TAYLOR. That is one of the new projects adopted by the last legislative bill.

Galveston is subject to periodical tropical storms which cause a piling up of the water in Galveston Bay. In the storm of 1900 it reached 15 feet above the mean Gulf level and flooded the peninsula extending out from the city and flooded the city; but since that time they have built a sea wall to protect the city and filled in.

A project was adopted by Congress for extending the sea wall built by the city for the protection of the city out to the channel.

It was anticipated when that project was adopted that a certain amount of the wall would be built in connection with fortification construction, but since the project was adopted the fortification plans have been changed, so it is no longer necessary to build any fortification there and, consequently, that much of the sea wall has been left unconstructed.

There is now 2,860 feet of the wall still left to be built. The result of it will be that if we should have another storm, instead of having that long peninsula some 3 miles long for the water to flow over, with a flow of moderate velocity, the water will be forced through the channel and over this short section of the spit, which is still left unprotected, with the practically certain result that there will be great scouring action take place, with the chance of scouring a channel south of the jetty and with the possibility of closing the channels, and with the probability that the material will be deposited so as to close the port of Galveston.

That is the danger.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I would like to ask another question. I am not interrogating the Senator with anything but the very best of intentions.

Mr. FLETCHER. I appreciate that.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that the Senator is familiar with these various projects and has given them study. I think the Senate ought to know something of the details before it can vote intelligently.

I am only asking these questions for the purpose of enlightenment, I will say to the Senator. How much of the $56,000,000, if that be allowed, have the engineers allocated to Galveston?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am glad to be able to answer the Senator's question. I have never been to Galveston in my life; I have been to very few of these harbors and can not give testimony based on personal knowledge as to the conditions; I have to be governed very largely and almost entirely by the testimony before the committee where we try to get at the facts, by the reports of the engineers, and by the statements of people who know. So I find, very fortunately, as was pointed out a minute ago, with reference to the sea wall at Galveston, just what General Taylor says on that subject right at hand here. His statement is as follows:

We regard that project as of so much importance that I know we will recommend to the Secretary the allotment of the full amount of $670,000 necessary to complete the project, whatever the amount of the appropriation may be. There can be no question as to the absolute necessity of that money being provided and that work being done at once.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida now yield further?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will observe from the testimony of General Taylor, which he has just quoted, that if only $27,000,000 were appropriated that project, if General Taylor's recommendations were to be followed, would be completed. It will take less than $1,000,000 to complete it, and that project will be completed regardless of the amount appropriated in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am pointing out, first, the merit of these projects which we adopted in 1922; but I infer that what the Senator from Nebraska has stated is correct; that the Engineer Corps will recommend to the Secretary of War—and I have no doubt the Secretary will do what they recommend—that he allot $670,000 for the work at Galveston, whatever the appropriation may be; that is, of course, if it exceeds the $13,000,000 which is to be devoted to maintenance work, as undoubtedly it will, for it is proposed in no event to make the appropriation less than $27,000,000, and I infer if an appropriation of $27,000,000 is provided that they will ask for $670,000 to complete the work at Galveston for the reasons they have given; and I think they ought to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. It seems to me that an improvement like that which has been partially finished ought to be completed.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the result of that? If they give Galveston $670,000, the total amount of their recommendation, which it is, then, of course, they can not give the Ohio River or New York Harbor all they require, because they will not have the money with which to do it, for after deducting the $670,000 to complete the work at Galveston there will not be left sufficient money to go around. Therefore the other projects must go without improvement for the present to that extent, and so on as to other specific projects.

In this same testimony General Taylor refers to the Ohio River. I will not take time to read his statement in reference to that. Then he refers to the lower Missouri and—

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish to interfere with what the Senator from Florida desires to say, as he has outlined his remarks, but he is passing over some matters which I think would be interesting—

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well, we will recur to the Ohio. For instance, the next item which is mentioned in this testimony is the Ohio River. The Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] asked this question, which is quite material:

Let me ask you for your judgment as a result of your experience. Do you find that you get more benefit and work for the money appropriated in this way than you did when it was appropriated so much for each specific project?

Now we come to the question of a lump-sum appropriation, which is a very material question. General Taylor says:

General TAYLOR. Very much better results. The money is used to a very much better advantage. For instance, last year we had the best year for work on the Ohio River that we have ever had. Ordinarily we would not think of being able to use more than $5,000,000.

Senator JONES. As a matter of fact, you have not been able to get more than that amount of money for that project, have you?

General TAYLOR. No, sir; we never have. But last year we allotted in the neighborhood of $7,500,000 for that work, and we made better progress in the work last year than we have made in many years.

Senator WADSWORTH. How much would be allowed for the Ohio River under this $56,000,000 appropriation?

General TAYLOR. We plan on $7,000,000. If we have as good a year for work this year as we had last year we will use $7,000,000.

Senator WADSWORTH. How far toward completion will that bring you?

General TAYLOR. The different dams are in different stages of completion. The total project provides for 54 dams. Of those 54, 37 are in operation, 9 are under construction, and 8 have not been commenced.

We would plan on commencing probably about three next year. The dams that are not commenced are nearly all in the lower river, and we find it very difficult to get contractors to bid on the work in the lower river because the conditions for work are so very uncertain.

Senator FLETCHER. And you will probably have to do that yourself?

General TAYLOR. We expect to have to do that all by hired labor.

There are two or three questions still unsettled which have to be settled before the work is finally completed, one of which is the possibility of power development at Louisville.

There is one place where there is a possibility of power development of the Ohio River, and that is at Louisville. If certain negotiations are carried through, if certain plans are carried into effect which the people have under consideration for developing water power at Louisville, they will probably be required to build the dam for power purposes and to relieve the Government of that expense. They may build the dam so high that it may not be necessary to build another dam across the river farther up. So we may be entirely relieved of the building of two of the remaining eight dams which are uncommenced on the Ohio River. This appropriation leaves those two out of the calculation for the present. That is the situation on the Ohio. It would seem to be a pity to deny the amount that it is estimated will be necessary to do the work which can be done next year on that great undertaking.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that it would be wise where a dam, for instance, like one of the dams on the Ohio River, is in the course of construction to stop work on it unless for some reason it was intended to abandon it entirely; I agree with the Senator as to that; but what I am trying to find out as the Senator goes along is what will happen if the proposed appropriation of $56,000,000 should be reduced. It seems that without damage, without injury, we could cut down the allotment for the improvement of the Ohio River, because General Taylor says that next year they expect to make an allotment for three new dams that have not been commenced. It would be better if we could build the dams right away; I concede that; but we have to economize; we can not do all the work at once, and there would be no injury to the existing work if no more than a sufficient amount were allocated to the Ohio River to keep the work going which has been commenced. It seems to me there might be a reduction in that instance. It would not be a desirable one, I will admit, for it is better always to complete such projects as soon as they can be completed; but we have not the money to do everything at once, and if we wanted to save some money and avoid making such a heavy appropriation, here is one place where I think the Senator himself by his explanation has shown there might be some reduction without any damage or injury.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think if we reduce the appropriation the engineers will be obliged to deny to the Ohio River a part of what they expected to be able to spend on it and could spend on it, namely $7,000,000. They probably would reduce that to $5,000,000. Of course, the Senator realizes that while any of the dams remain uncompleted the Ohio River is only as deep as it is below those dams, no matter how deep it is made above them; in other words, the river is only fit for navigation according to its lowest depth at any one point in the river. We have not accomplished much by deepening the channel of the river if we do not continue the improvement on down to its mouth. That is one reason why we ought to go on, it seems to me, and complete all the dams on the Ohio River and thereby finish the project. We adopted the project in 1910; we have spent $48,080,000 on it; we are getting now pretty close to the end of it; but what we have spent will not count for much unless we complete it, and the sooner we complete it, it seems to me, the better it will be. It appeals to me also that that is the wisest course to pursue.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator about the navigation of the Ohio River. How many months in the year is the stream navigable? It is closed a part of the time during the cold weather, I presume, is it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume likely it is. The purpose is to make, as a minimum, a 9-foot channel throughout the length of the river.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Ohio River had a 9-foot channel, there would be a 9-foot channel to New Orleans from the point on the Ohio where the 9-foot channel commenced, would there not?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is brought out in this very hearing, from which I quote as follows:

Senator WADSWORTH. When the Ohio River project is finished, what will be the average depth of the channel?

General TAYLOR. A minimum depth of 9 feet.

Senator FLETCHER. From Pittsburgh?

General TAYLOR. From Pittsburgh all the way to the mouth.

That is, a minimum of 9 feet. At present I presume they have not over 4 feet in certain portions of the river.

Mr. NORRIS. General Taylor means the mouth of the Ohio River, I presume.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. NORRIS. Now let me ask the Senator a further question there. From the mouth of the Ohio, where it enters into the Mississippi, and from there to the mouth of the Mississippi there is already a 9-foot channel, is there not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; and more.

Mr. NORRIS. So that the completion of the improvement would really mean a 9-foot channel from Pittsburgh to New Orleans?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; the Senator is correct about that.

Mr. President, I do not want to appear as dwelling too much on details, but I feel very strongly that it would be a great mistake to reduce this appropriation. To be sure, the Congress have not felt bound by the recommendations of the Budget Bureau; but that is perfectly legitimate, for it is in the province of Congress to say whether or not they believe that the Bureau of the Budget knows more about rivers and harbors than do the engineers of the War Department. The House evidently believed the engineers knew more about the needs of the country concerning the development and the improvement of rivers and harbors and the expense involved and the justification for that expense than did the Bureau of the Budget. So when the bill was reported the committee exceeded the Budget recommendation by $10,000,000; when the bill came upon the floor of the House the amount was increased from $37,000,000 to $56,000,000; and the bill comes here with that having been done in the other body. All that we are doing now is accepting the action of the House. We are not increasing this appropriation at all. The Appropriations Committee of the Senate reports the bill just as it came from the House respecting this item, and it is a question whether the Senate will pass the bill as it came from the House or modify it, as may be indicated.

Those who are proposing this reduction are against this sort of expenditure. They have been all along; but I take it they will not undertake to reverse the policy of this Government, which has been in effect for a hundred years, that the obligation and duty of the Government is to take care of these highways of commerce over which the Government has jurisdiction. The States can not do it, individuals can not do it, because these are navigable waters under the control and jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Now it is proposed to reduce this expenditure to an amount which will be ineffective, and will not carry out that policy which has been adopted by Congress, and which can only be put into effect by certain expenditures of public funds. That provision is made here in the House bill. Those who propose to reduce it will cripple the whole work, so that we had almost as well not make any attempt to carry it on.

Mr. KING and Mr. NEW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator has just made a statement with respect to the power of the States in dealing with navigable waters which, with his kind permission, I should be very glad if he would elaborate.

As I understood his position, it was that under our form of government the States had no right to make improvements upon streams if they were navigable, because under the Constitution the Federal Government has charge of or control over—I am not sure as to the word the Senator used—navigable streams. It seems to me that if that is the Senator's position—and I ask for information—he has stated the proposition a little too broadly.

The only power that the Federal Government has over the streams, or the waters of the streams, is to regulate commerce. The Senator knows that under the common law, which was adopted so far as navigable streams and riparian owners were concerned when our Government sprang into existence, the sovereign State not only owned the bed of the stream but it owned the right to control the waters of the stream. The Thirteen Colonies, when they formed the Union, became sovereign over the beds of the streams. They had control over the waters. They owned the waters, so far as ownership may exist in a running stream. They certainly owned the usufruct—subject, of course, to the riparian owners—and they owned the bed of the stream. When the Federal Constitution was adopted, the States merely delegated to the Federal Government the power to regulate commerce. I do not understand that the power to regulate commerce inhibits the States or individuals from the utilization of a stream, navigable or unnavigable, whether it forms the boundary between two States or whether it arises within a State and flows beyond the State. The Federal Government has no right, I insist, to inhibit the use of the stream so long as its navigability is not destroyed. States or individuals may take the water from the stream, but if they return it undiminished in quantity, undeteriorated in quality and do not interfere with the navigability of the stream, they may do so. Obviously, if an individual, a municipality, or a sovereign State improves the navigability of the stream, Congress has no right to interfere, and ought not to interfere. Such an act would be in furtherance of the use of the streams for commerce, and to that extent it would be in harmony with any regulatory power that the Federal Government might exercise.

I believe that under the construction which is daily being placed upon the commerce clause of the Constitution, and one or two other clauses of the Constitution to which I might refer, we are invading the rights and sovereign powers of the States, and if we persist in that construction much longer the States will be mere shells. I ask the Senator if he believes that merely because of the regulatory power a State may not increase the navigability of a stream, and, if not, why not?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. The position of the Senator from Utah as to the rights of the States over the waters within their respective territories was never questioned until about 1890. By an act then passed—I think an amendment to the rivers and harbors bill—and another one in 1906 and another in 1910, a different doctrine was asserted. This was the first time it was ever thought that a State or an individual or riparian proprietor had to go to Congress to get a permit to improve its or their property. Prior to these acts the only power which Congress exercised was to remove obstructions if they were placed in a navigable stream—not improvements, but obstructions. If it was determined by the proper authority—which was the War Department then as now—that it was an obstruction, it was removed, because it interfered with navigation. The conservationists got through the water-power legislation, more particularly in 1910—that is the drastic act—providing that no riparian proprietor or State could construct a structure of any kind in a navigable stream without an act of Congress permitting it, even if it was a great improvement to navigation. This is just a broad, arbitrary, unreasonable, unconstitutional statute. I know that in my State—and I think you will find it in the records of the others—the Tennessee General Assembly made divers appropriations for the improvement of the navigable waters in that State as far back as 1820, and there never was any question in regard to it until Congress assumed this jurisdiction in 1890 and 1900; and I believe that if to-day a State or a riparian proprietor were to put a structure in a stream without permission of Congress—not an obstruction, but a structure that did not obstruct the navigation of the river—and the Federal Government were to attempt to indict them for it or to remove it the courts would hold that it had no authority to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I had no idea that this question, involving the constitutional power of Congress and involving State rights, would be raised at this time. I have not at hand the decision, but I have in mind the fact that as far back as the Ogden case, which arose in New York and was decided by Chief Justice Marshall, it has been well established that the United States Government had jurisdiction over the navigable waters, rivers, and harbors of the United States, and for purposes of navigation exclusive jurisdiction. Beyond that, the jurisdiction would not extend to anything more than the protection of the navigation.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the earliest case upon the subject along the line of the argument of the Senator from Utah involving the rights of the States, the case of Pollard against Hagan, arose in Alabama, and, I think, is reported in 3 Howard. The case of Ogden against Mills only involved the question of navigation, but the States hold the streams in trust for their people. There is not only that early case but there is an unbroken line of authorities to sustain that proposition up to within the last two or three years, one case arising in New York in relation to the St. Lawrence River, and another arising in the State of Kentucky, in which the Supreme Court of the United States went back and sustained the Alabama case and all the cases following it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, beyond any question the States can appropriate money and can expend that money in improving navigable waterways, provided they do it upon the approval and really under the direction of the engineers of the War Department.

We have a peculiar situation in my State that bears on the question raised by the Senator from Utah. I think there the Federal authorities are going too far. There is a great inland lake in my State, Lake Okeechobee, the largest inland lake in the country outside of the Great Lakes, I think. It is some 50 miles north and south and 50 miles east and west across that lake, with a uniform depth of about 18 to 20 feet. The overflow of Lake Okeechobee is what produces what are known as the Everglades. The State undertook to drain the Everglades, to reclaim 4,000,000 acres of the very richest kind of land, and to do that they have to dig canals and they have to lower the level of Lake Okeechobee. When the rivers and streams flow into Lake Okeechobee from the north and excessive rains fall, the overflow takes place on the south, and that overflow spreads over the 4,000,000 acres or more of land known as the Everglades. In order to prevent that overflow, the plan of drainage operations includes the idea of lowering Lake Okeechobee some 4 feet by these canals puncturing the rim of the lake and relieving it of that much water. The War Department says, "You can not do that, because that is a navigable waterway." This lake is entirely inland, all in the State of Florida, but the Federal Government says that it is navigable—and it is, of course; it is 17 or 18 feet deep—and that the State can not lower that water without the permit of the Federal Government.

There is no conflict between them, because everything is working harmoniously, but I am referring now to the principle. In the case of an inland lake like that, which does not connect with any ocean or gulf or waterway outside at all until you force the connection, I doubt very much if the Federal Government has authority and jurisdiction over that body of water, lying entirely within the State, and not connecting, as I say, with any sea or ocean or waterway leading to and usable in interstate or foreign commerce. Interstate or foreign commerce can not be involved in this case, because the lake is all within the State. So I doubt very much if the Federal authorities are not stretching their authority when they undertake to say to the State authorities: "You can not lower that lake 1 foot unless you get our permit to do it, and you shall not do it below a certain depth." The State authorities are willing to accept the opinion and the good judgment of the Army engineers, because they do not want to harm the navigability of the lake in any way, anyhow, and so there is no conflict anywhere; but I am referring now to the principle involved under the Constitution.

Even in the instance of that inland lake, where no foreign or interstate commerce is involved, the Federal authorities assume jurisdiction, because it is a navigable body of water. But, generally speaking, unquestionably the Federal Government has jurisdiction over the rivers and harbors of the country which carry interstate and foreign commerce, and facilitates it, and no State can build a bridge across navigable water without permission from Congress. They can not do anything, certainly, to obstruct in any way the navigability of such a waterway, and in order to be sure of it we have provided that the State authorities or individuals shall get a permit before they can act. Congress and the Federal Government having jurisdiction of navigation, the Supreme Court having held that "commerce" includes navigation, require that that jurisdiction shall be maintained and respected at all times, and unless permission is granted by Congress no structure can be put upon or in or across a navigable waterway.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator has finished that particular item, I desire to say just a word. I wanted the Senator to go a little further than he did in discussing some of the items which have already been approved. I believe an examination would show whether or not we can make a reduction, and if so, how much of a reduction we can make without serious injury to the projects. I would like to ask the Senator about the Missouri River from Kansas City to the Mississippi River. Is that one of the 35 projects to be completed?

Mr. FLETCHER. Only maintenance is provided for on a portion of the Missouri River. On the Missouri River, from Kansas City to Sioux City, the only thing to be taken care of, if we appropriate $56,000,000, is maintenance, for which $25,000 is provided. From Sioux City to Fort Benton the only matter that will be taken care of, if we appropriate $56,000,000, will be maintenance, for which $15,000 is provided. But from Kansas City to the mouth the bill contemplates an expenditure of $1,000,000 for improvement and $500,000 for maintenance. The expenditure of $1,500,000, therefore, is contemplated from Kansas City to the mouth of the Missouri River.

Mr. NORRIS. There are no dams to be built there, are there?

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. NORRIS. No rock work or anything of that kind has to be done, and with that much money provided they could do a good deal. What is the channel they are providing for, and how much of a channel have they now?

Mr. FLETCHER. I refer again to General Taylor's statement before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, page 168, where the following occurred:

Senator WADSWORTH. Under this $56,000,000 how much will be allotted to the lower Missouri River?

General TAYLOR. Probably in the neighborhood of $1,000,000.

Senator SPENCER. From Kansas City to the mouth?

General TAYLOR. From Kansas City to the mouth.

Senator WADSWORTH. What progress has been made there, General, in the lower Missouri River?

General TAYLOR. There has been no progress in the last few years because we had no money for it. Last year we allotted $100,000, which was just barely sufficient for a small amount of maintenance work with no new work at all.

Senator WADSWORTH. There has been a great deal of money spent there, however, in years past, has there not?

General TAYLOR. Yes, sir; there has been quite a little money spent there in years past.

Senator WADSWORTH. Can you give any idea how much?

General TAYLOR. Since the new project has been adopted there has been spent for new work from United States funds $7,380,579.60.

Senator WADSWORTH. With really nothing to show for it thus far?

General TAYLOR. Very little to show for it, because it is such a small part of the estimated cost of the project. The estimated cost was $20,000,000.

Senator WADSWORTH. What was the depth contemplated in that project?

General TAYLOR. Six feet. There has been, perhaps you know, a great interest manifested in the Missouri Valley in the last year or two by the landowners in doing work themselves for the protection of their own land. There is a concern known as the Wood Bros. Construction Co. which has been engaged in that work. They took it up first because they had a ranch of some 11,000 acres not far from Omaha, Neb., into which the river was cutting very badly, and in order to protect their own land they put in a certain form of dike protection. They then advertised that, so to speak, to the farmers in the country, showed what they had done, and they formed a construction company that succeeded in inducing all of the States along the Missouri River to pass laws authorizing the formation of protection districts. Those districts are authorized to issue long-term bonds, which, I am informed, the banks take at par, and the money has been expended in the river-bank protection.

The Woods Bros. Construction Co. has done over $1,000,000 worth of private work this year on the Missouri River for bank protection.

We are working with them as we believe that that is the proper thing to do on the Missouri. We think that the landowner, who is benefited directly by the bank-protection work, should pay for it himself, and we have been encouraging that development all we could with the idea of getting the people benefited to pay for it and let the Government do the work which is purely for the benefit of navigation.

I undertook to explain this yesterday with reference to the upper Missouri. General Taylor continued:

I think that movement has got such a good start there that it is bound to continue.

Then he passed on to a discussion of the upper Missouri.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator can give me the information, I would like to know a little more about what has been accomplished with the expenditure of that money. It seems that quite a large sum has been expended.

Mr. FLETCHER. Quite a large sum, and they have not gotten very far with it, because they have not had enough at any one time to prevent the sweeping away of what had been accomplished in the way of channel deepening the year before by the washing in of the banks and filling.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the answer the Senator has given involves this question: If we dig out a channel this year, it fills up, and there is no channel there the next year. Is it wise to go on doing that? In the first place, I am very much interested in that part of the Missouri River as well as other parts, but I think that if that stretch from Kansas City to the Mississippi River can be made navigable it will mean a great deal to a very large section of the country and a large number of people.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. But I do not want the Government to waste money, and I would like to know really what has been accomplished. I think five or six or seven million dollars have been spent on that stretch of the river, have they not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. What was done with the money, and how much of it was spent in any one year, if the Senator knows?

Mr. FLETCHER. That will be shown by the engineers' report. I have not that data before me, but it shows precisely what has been spent each year.

Mr. NORRIS. There are no dams there, are there?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are no dams. I think the engineers feel very much encouraged, and I think the committee which looked into it feels encouraged, on account of this effort to protect the banks and shores. There was a demonstration made here as to what could be accomplished in that respect, and there were moving-picture exhibitions of what the Wood Bros. Construction Co. are actually doing. Unquestionably their process of preventing the washing away of the banks of the river and protecting the banks is a great success.

Mr. NORRIS. I am familiar with it to some extent myself, and it is a great success.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the main work. If that is done the matter of deepening the channel for navigation will not be a very serious problem.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I should think not. If it depends on the success of that method of holding the banks it would be successful, because I believe it has been demonstrated that the method used by the Wood Bros. is more successful and more economical than any other that has ever been devised.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so; and I think the engineers feel that way and say they are working with the Wood Bros.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator know whether it is necessary to excavate to any great extent from Kansas City to the Mississippi?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is necessary to some extent, but of course there will not be much excavation, because the depth is to be only 6 feet. I think there are no engineering difficulties in the way when the question of bank protection is once settled.

Mr. NORRIS. That will be comparatively inexpensive, will it not? If they could make the river navigable by that means, why should not the Government do it, the same as they use some other means to make a river navigable, instead of expecting the owners of the land to do it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think they are cooperating with the owners as far as they can. Of course, there is quite a distance from Kansas City down, and it takes a good deal of money to do that work. I forget the mileage, but I think it is something over 300 miles.

Mr. NORRIS. It is between three and four hundred miles. It is clear across the State of Missouri, of course.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is an expensive thing even to remove the silt from year to year. I have said all I care to submit now.

I simply say that I think it will be a great mistake to reduce this appropriation.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I want to commend all the Senator from Florida has said with reference to the Engineer Corps of the United States Army. Whether this work should be placed upon their very able shoulders or not, I am not prepared to argue, but that it could be placed on more competent shoulders, I am sure is not the case.

While that is true, and while I have the highest respect for their professional ability, they are not passing upon these projects from the commercial standpoint. I know they say that the amounts which they have fixed in their various recommendations can be profitably expended; that is to say, the Government is justified in putting the amounts of money assigned into these various projects, but, after all, conceding everything which may be conceded, the engineers are not looking at these things from the commercial standpoint. They tell us what may be done to good advantage, but they do not tell us where the money is to come from that is to pay the bill. That is in other hands. The responsibility for raising the money is with other departments.

Now, Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the Ohio River project particularly and the expenditure of all that the engineers have estimated for work along that river. The Ohio River was a great artery of commerce before the oldest Member of this body came into being. It is not a purely local enterprise at all. It directly supplies a vast area. From Pittsburgh to New Orleans, which is the outer end of the Ohio River's real course after its confluence with the Mississippi, is a very great distance. It traverses and supplies at least 25 per cent of the States of the Union, and a great deal more than that, because it goes directly to the seaboard; and further still, by reason of its geographical location, it can carry a character of freight and supplies that can be transported by river to better advantage than in any other way—coal particularly—and the iron manufactures of the Pittsburgh district and the various other manufacturing towns and areas through which the Ohio River flows.

But, Mr. President, I think that the matter of the expenditure of the money that is to be spent on river and harbor improvements under the bill, after all, is a matter of common sense more than anything else.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moses in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has been speaking very interestingly about the Ohio River project, which is now perhaps two-thirds or more completed. We have a very large investment in those dams, but they are substantially useless because the other dams have not been completed. When the entire project is completed it is going to improve transportation on the Ohio River.

If I may give to the Senator from Indiana a concrete illustration which would affect present conditions of transportation, I would like to do so, and it will only take a moment. Some years ago when I was investigating the subject I found that during one year more than a million tons of coal were shipped into Cincinnati over and above what had been shipped in the year before, but very much less of the coal went down the Ohio River by barge. This was at a time when there was a shortage of freight power on the railroads.

Mr. NEW. I understand the Senator to mean that the shipments came to Cincinnati by water and then were diverted to rail because the river was not navigable below that point?

Mr. POMERENE. The river was not navigable at that time. That was it in part. Again, there was another situation for which the railroads, as I was informed, were in part responsible, because it seemed that a rate was given for the shipment of coal by rail from Cincinnati to Toledo and farther north which was very much less if the coal went into Cincinnati by rail. In other words, there was a very much higher rate if the shipment of coal from Cincinnati to Toledo unfortunately happened to come into Cincinnati by water upon the Ohio River.

All of these facts, it seems to me, indicate the necessity of completing the Ohio River project at the earliest moment possible. After that shall have been completed, then we will be able to demonstrate whether or not river transportation is going to be what its friends claim for it, or a failure.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, all that the Senator from Ohio has said is true. Moreover, the discrimination which he has cited in the matter of freight rates from the Ohio River north on the railroads is, I think, unjustifiable and wholly wrong. All that he said about the advisability of completing the work on the Ohio River at an early date is also true. But, Mr. President, I insist that all of the work is still possible if we keep the appropriation at a very much smaller figure than the $56,000,000 which is called for as the bill now reads. I am perfectly willing, as a friend and champion of the Ohio River improvement, to vote for a reduction in the appropriation. I do not believe that the amount of money asked for river and harbor improvement is justified at this time for the reason that I find in it so many projects which, it appears to me—I do not think I am wrong about it, either—can be put over until a more propitious time.

One further thought: In determining the allotment of the money, say $29,000,000 or whatever sum may be required, it occurs to me that the object to be given prime consideration is what projects can be developed with reference to do the greater good for the greater number. Certainly the Ohio River project is not local in its application. It does not merely supply a few towns along the Ohio banks or along the Indiana banks, or those of any other particular State through which it travels in its course to the sea, but it supplies a large number of States. I think it flows either through or by approximately a dozen States, and, as I have already said, it reaches the seaboard with freight of a character that can be so easily transported by water. The element of time does not cut a great figure in the delivery of a large load of coal between the Kanawha Valley and New Orleans. If it is 10 days, all right; if it is 20 days, it still reaches there in good condition. There are projects provided for in the bill which ought to be taken care of adequately now, but there are others which can be and should be deferred out of consideration for the difficulties which the Government is experiencing in raising money to meet its most urgent everyday needs.

For these reasons, and believing, as I do, that the Ohio River improvement will not suffer—at least, that it need not suffer—as a result of a lessened appropriation here, I shall vote for a reduction in the amount now carried in the bill for rivers and harbors.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate finish its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I would like to have an opportunity to send for a Senator who is interested in the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Idaho refer to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The information which reached me was that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] desires to have a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to-morrow morning, and that he therefore would not like to have a recess taken to 11 o'clock.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume that he would not object to 12 o'clock as the meeting hour to-morrow, because that is the usual hour of meeting anyway.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection if the Senator from New York understands the wish of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not converse directly with the Senator from Nebraska, but the information came to me through another Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask what the request was?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That when the Senate finish its business to-day it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from New York if a day will be given this week for the consideration of the calendar; that is to say, will we have a morning hour?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not before the pending bill is finished.

Mr. KING. After the bill is out of the way we may have a morning hour?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not in a position to give the Senator an assurance on anything except in connection with the pending bill.

Mr. KING. I do not see the leader on the other side present at the moment, but the papers state that the Senator from New York is assistant leader, and I appeal to him for information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am having enough trouble with this particular bill without going further to find more.

Mr. KING. I can assure the Senator we are facilitating it in every possible way in order to secure its passage.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have noticed that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, some criticism has been indulged in here relative to certain items provided for in the appropriation carried in the bill. I am frank to say that I share the feeling, in part, of those who have indulged in that criticism. I think appropriations are proposed to be made for some items that ought not to be provided for, but I am very anxious that the country shall understand from the denunciations which have been heaped upon the bill as a whole that a particular project to which I shall refer in a minute does not come within that class but is of a different character altogether. I see my friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] smiling.

I took occasion yesterday in some remarks I made here to point out some items that I thought were without justification. I go further and say that I think the fault is not with the Board of Army Engineers entirely; but if I may say so without improper reflection upon the committee of which I am a most humble member, I think the fault rests in part upon the Committee on Commerce. I think there are a number of items that ought to be taken out of the bill and the projects ought to be permanently abandoned.

My attention was drawn to that some months ago when I was examining a bill introduced by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Senate bill 3017, in which are named 47 or 48 different projects upon which at different times public funds have been expended in large amounts, running up into how many millions of dollars I do not know; but it was then proposed that those 47 or 48 different projects should be definitely and finally abandoned. I think that bill should have been reported and passed, and I think another bill of that character would help very much to solve this problem.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. How many of the projects which are covered by the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] are included in this report?

Mr. WILLIS. I have not had time to check up on that. I should say, in fairness, though, I have not found any. There may be some, but I am not in a position to answer that question definitely.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator expect to cure the situation when, notwithstanding the recommendation of the able Senator from Washington to abandon 40 different projects, we have before us, or shall have in a short time, a proposition to include 200 more under the provisions of the river and harbor bill, for, as I understand, the Army engineers, under pressure or otherwise, have recommended 200 additional projects, 35 of which find some provision for their improvement or maintenance in the pending bill?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah understands that the bill to which I have referred was not reported from the committee. I think it ought to have been; I think it ought now to be reported, and that an additional bill should be reported recommending the abandonment of some other projects, among them certain ones to which I drew attention on yesterday, which, in my opinion, are unworthy and ought not to be continued. I think those ought to be included in the bill of the Senator from Washington. So I think my position in this matter is fairly understood.

In these criticisms, however, I do not desire that there should go by without some word of response the suggestion that the whole river and harbor bill is a measure that could be treated lightly and that is unproductive of good. There have been a number of inquiries and some remarks have been made concerning the Ohio River improvement. At this time I simply wish to ask permission to place in the Record a brief statement from the report of the engineers as to what is actually being done and what has been accomplished on that great project.

Without taking time to read it all, I call attention to the fact that the estimates for this year for the completion of the work on the Ohio River are $7,526,000. There have been expended upon that work thus far $72,000,000. Five million four hundred thousand passengers and 8,000,000 tons of freight, worth $464,000,000, were carried on this project in 1921. It is well understood that when that work shall have been completed it will, as my colleague, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], has suggested, furnish the best opportunity that probably can be furnished by the country to determine once and for all the question of the efficacy of water transportation. I desire to say that all the facts at hand thus far indicate that that project, if we establish a 9-foot stage of water from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, has every promise of yielding splendid results to the country. This project I have supported cordially and I shall continue to support it.

Mr. President, I ask to place in the Record at this point brief excerpts from the report of the Army engineers showing the condition of the work on the Ohio River and the necessity for further appropriation to complete the project at an early date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Effect of improvement: The great benefit claimed for the improvement will be felt only when the slack-water system has been extended far enough downstream to permit of continuous navigation at all times (except when interrupted by floods or ice) over a longer section of the river, connecting the large cities on the upper section with those on the middle and lower sections. The commercial effect of the series of completed dams on the upper river is reflected in the marked increase in general traffic and in the amount of coal shipped from the mines along the Monongahela River, to industrial plants on the Ohio River at Aliquippa and Midland, Pa., and Steubenville, Ohio. Coke in considerable quantities is also being shipped from the Monongahela River to steel plants at New Cumberland, W. Va. Coal is also being shipped upriver from pool 11 to industrial plants above.

During the low-water seasons of the past five years coal to the amount of approximately 1,040,000 tons was shipped from the Kanawha River fields to Cincinnati and other points along the Ohio River by releasing water impounded in the pools formed by the dams on the upper Ohio and its tributaries, creating artificial rises and assisting coal fleets with partially loaded barges over the shoals in the unimproved section of the river. This coal was urgently needed and much suffering and great economic loss were prevented as a result of receipt of the coal thus shipped, especially during 1917, 1918, and 1919, as none of it could have been transported by rail, owing to the serious congestion existing on the railroads at that time. Oil and gasoline have also been shipped in considerable quantities upriver to Pittsburgh from points in West Virginia and Kentucky by means of tank barges.

Proposed operations: The balance available at the close of the year from previous appropriations will be variously applied at each of the locks and dams now under construction and still unfinished to that part of the construction the early completion of which will be most advantageous to the progress of the particular work. Upon these locks and dams which are nearest completion the funds will be applied to the placing of the wickets and their different parts, installing gate-operating machinery or power-house equipment, and in placing in proper condition the grounds belonging to the improvement. Where work has not been so far advanced the available funds will be applied to cofferdam construction and in placing the masonry of the lock or dam, depending upon the state of the particular work. It is not possible to state definitely the rate at which funds available at the close of the year will or can be expended, as the rate of progress is controlled largely by the stage of water in the river. However, in view of the small balances remaining from the previous river and harbor act, it was necessary toward the close of the fiscal year to transfer and allot funds previously allotted to various locks and dams in order to prevent cessation of the most important work. In view of this fact and also in view of the large sums obligated by contracts for the construction of the dams at Nos. 32 and 34, together with the large amount of work being undertaken by hired labor methods, it is believed that the balance available will be entirely exhausted by the end of the fiscal year 1923.

It is proposed to apply the funds—$7,000,000—for which estimate is submitted in this report for the fiscal year 1924 to continuing or completing work upon the locks and dams under construction at the close of the year, and to commencing the construction of such additional locks and dams as may be possible with the funds provided.

There has been great development of navigation on the upper part of the Ohio River since the locks and dams on that part of the river have been completed, and urgent appeals are now being made by navigation interests for the early completion of the work on the lower river.

Recommended modifications of project: None.

Commercial statistics: Of the total commerce reported for the calendar year 1921, 2,135,608.30 tons passed through the locks and 5,172,271.79 tons went by open river. Coal constituted 60 per cent of the tonnage and sand, gravel, and stone 22 per cent. The principal items in order of tonnage representing the remainder are miscellaneous, manufactured iron and steel, railroad ties, coke, merchandise, machinery, and oil.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a few words in favor of this item before the vote is taken.

Mr. President, the most important question which is now absorbing the attention of the American people is that of transportation. Freight rates for many causes have increased enormously. Of the items that go to make up freight rates, labor constitutes a net charge of 60 per cent; more than 10 per cent is supplies, such as oil, lumber, and coal; and 5 per cent or more is taxes. I do not know of any way in which we are going to reduce those items, and, if they are not reduced, then, taking all the other items that go into the making up of a freight bill, we have only a leeway of 15 per cent in which to determine the problem. So, for the time being, and probably for a long time to come, the American people are going to pay very much higher freight rates than they paid before the Great War. The Congress of the United States, no matter what some orators may say, are not going to perform miracles and bring about a reduction in freight rates so as to make them comparable with the rates which were charged before the war, though, of course, I should be glad if it were possible to accomplish that result. Before the World War we probably had the cheapest freight rates, taken in the aggregate, of any great country in the world. I wish we could return to that condition, for it meant much to the health, the life, and the prosperity of our Nation, but we are not going to do it.

It is almost impossible for some of the heavy freights of this country now to move under the present high freight rates. There was a day before the Great War when I remember that the heavy products from the Birmingham district, such as iron and steel, could stand the rate of freight then charged and go by rail into the eastern markets, such as New York and Boston, and even compete with the Pennsylvania furnaces and mills; but to-day the increased freight rate practically bars the products of that district out of the eastern market. That is only an illustration, but it is an illustration that may be cited in reference to many other products from many sections of the Union, and we are confronted with that condition because of these insurmountable costs which stare the American people in the face. If anyone will tell me how to reduce the cost of the 85 per cent of charges to which I have referred against every freight rate I should like to know how it may be done. No one has been able to say how it may be done up to this time.

However, Mr. President, nature, in the geography of America, has given us a way to solve the problem if we would but use it. This country has one of the greatest natural water systems in the world. The Mississippi River extends almost from the Canadian line to the Gulf and its tributaries reach out to the Alleghenies and toward the Rocky Mountains; the rivers of New York and New England are prepared to carry the commerce of that section to the sea, and so are the great rivers of the Pacific; and yet, Mr. President, practically speaking, American commerce is unable to avail itself of the opportunity to use that means of transportation. It is not that it can not be done. We fight here over whether a 6-foot channel or a 9-foot channel is needed. I am in favor of making the channel as good as it is possible to make it; but boats can go to the sea on a 6-foot channel.

The great commerce of Europe in many cases is carried on 4-foot channels. I have stood on the banks of the Rhine and seen lines of barges going up and coming down that river, carrying the bulk of the freight that is moved in that valley, notwithstanding the competition of lines of double-track railroad on each bank. The Rhine is not nearly so great a river as is the Mississippi, it is not so navigable as is the Mississippi today, and it only compares favorably with many of our lesser rivers; yet, although we have these great waterways, many of which we could use to-day, we can not interest the Government of the United States in developing them for the people; we can not interest the Congress to take the action that is necessary to be taken in order that this method of transportation may be availed of.

Why is that? It is because from the beginning the great railroad lines of this country went out to kill competition. Twenty years ago, 30 years ago, 40 years ago, we invited competition in transportation; the man who was engaged in the transportation business was fighting for a competition that would give him control of the movement of freight, and so he proceeded to put his competitor out of business, with the result that, although 40 years ago steamboats were moving down the Mississippi and up the Ohio and as far north as St. Paul, carrying immense cargoes of freight, the railroad lines reduced their rates so as to starve the steamboat lines out of existence, and we sat quietly by and allowed it to be done. Every now and then when we have a bill before Congress the railroad managers say, "We may have done that in the past, but we are not going to do it in the future"; and yet, when the time comes and the opportunity is afforded, every effort is made to drive out and destroy water competition.

A child knows that heavy products can be transported cheaper by water than by land. The American people are entitled to water transportation to enable their products to be carried to sea as cheaply as possible in order that they may compete in the foreign markets. There is just one thing to be done, and that is to make destructive competition on the part of the railroads cease. The clause in the act regulating the railroads allowing them to reduce their rates to meet water competition was exactly the same as allowing them to reduce their rates to kill water competition, and they have done it, and they are going to continue to do it. Even when the Government itself is engaged in the business, as it is to-day on the Mississippi River and the Warrior River, we can not get Government bureaus reasonably and fairly to protect the Government's own business in the distribution of freight.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Did I understand the Senator to say that the railroads had reduced freight rates to the point where they destroyed water competition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They have done so in the past; yes. What they do is this: They reduce their rates below or equal to the water rates. It makes no difference that they can not afford to do it; boats may carry the freight cheaper and do carry it cheaper; but the railroads meet the water rates in order to take the business away from the boat lines, and then the shipper, because he may get or thinks he may get a day or two advantage in delivery and because it may be easier to load on trains, goes to the railroads and lets the boat line perish. That is not a theory, but it is a fact.

Mr. BORAH. That may have been true years ago, but it certainly has not been true very lately.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has not been true very lately, and why? Because the dead man can not speak. They killed water transportation, and no live man is going back into the business under similar circumstances; but the fault lies here, on this floor. They need not be dead men if we would give them the right to carry the freight fairly where they can do it the cheapest, and not allow somebody to come along and cut their throats.

Mr. BORAH. That might be true in some parts of the United States, but it never could be true from the Atlantic to the Pacific or from the Pacific to the Atlantic, because the rivers do not run right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am surprised that my friend from Idaho should drift into that line of thought that many people do drift into in this country, that the only ports in this country are on the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific Ocean; that New York and San Francisco are the great ports of the country, and that all freight and all traffic and all thought must lead there. God Almighty made the Mississippi River. He gave these great rivers for the use of the people that live here, and the natural course of transportation down the Mississippi Valley should be to New Orleans. The people who have the wheat of the Northwest and the cotton of the South to send to foreign markets should not have to pay high freight rates to go across the Allegheny Mountains when they have a practically level way down the Mississippi River and when they have a great river on which to carry their products at low cost.

Mr. BORAH. That is true of a certain kind of freight, and of course the argument of the Senator limited to those things is unanswerable; but there is a vast amount of freight which has not been touched by the situation to which the Senator refers. The thing that is destroying us out West is the high freight rates; it does not make any difference whether you go by the Panama Canal or whether you go by the railroads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; I agree with the Senator; I just said that; but, if the Senator will tell me, is he in favor now of cutting railroad wages back to what they were before the war? No; I will answer for him, and he will not deny it. Can he reduce the prices of coal and lumber and oil, except as time and competition will reduce them? No. Can he reduce the taxes that the railroads have to pay? No.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I could do that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know how the Senator could.

Mr. BORAH. It is a very easy thing to do if we have a mind to do it. Of course, the States and the Congress must act together in regard to such things. The proposition with me is that the thing which we are doing here with reference to a vast amount of the river and harbor appropriations in this bill—appropriations which swell the amount and make it exorbitant—will never reduce freight rates by a cent, because the money is not spent on rivers or streams where there will be any freight moving.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take issue with the Senator, and I am glad he said that, because we are coming right down to the issue, and I want to face it. I challenge the Senator's proposition that he can reduce the taxes in my State or his State that the railroads have to pay, or that he can reduce the income taxes that have to be paid to the National Government. That is an impossibility practically, no matter what it may be theoretically with the Senator; and there you have 85 per cent—labor, supplies, and taxes—of what has to be paid to run the railroads, and you can not make any great reduction on the other 15 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, we can not reduce taxes unless we reduce appropriations. I admit that. It is apparent that we are not going to reduce appropriations, but we could if we desired to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, we might cut down the salaries of the officers in our States; we might fail to pay pensions to veterans; we might do a great many things; but we are not going to do it, and the Senator knows that as well as I do. Taxes are not coming down.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him just there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Possibly the Senator was going to mention it, but the Senator from Idaho was talking about the minor streams. There are only one hundred and eighty-one thousand and a few odd dollars carried in this bill for the improvement of what are known as minor rivers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly the Senator is right.

What I want to say, and what I am coming to, is this: I do not stand here to criticize anybody else, and I do not mean it in the way of criticism, but I stand here because I feel that a great section of this country is being antagonized on the very most important proposition that confronts it. It is being antagonized simply because people say: "You have the rivers, and there is no freight moving on them"; and yet we know that if to-day we would repeal the clauses in the transportation acts that allow the railroads to reduce freight rates so as to drive the steamboats and barge lines off the rivers, they would go back there and function for the benefit of the American people with lower freight rates—at least for the benefit of a large portion of the American people.

We have these great rivers, and they are navigable now. They were navigable before the Civil War, and carried vast volumes of freight even before they were improved. We have Government investments of hundreds of millions of dollars in them.

Mr. BORAH. They carried a vastly greater amount of freight than they carry now before we put the millions into them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not because we have improved them, however. They carried greater freight then because we did not invite an unfair and unjust and unequal competition against them.

Here is the situation, and nobody can deny it: In many, many instances, if not all, the railroad lines have reduced their rates below what they could fairly carry the freight for, below the cost of carrying it, in order to destroy water competition, and then have made the hinterland of the railroad that did not lie on the water pay the additional cost in order that the road might run. That is the story, and that is the truth of it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not agree with the Senator that the railroads have reduced freight rates below a point at which they could afford to carry freight. I can not believe that the facts as they are developed will sustain that proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not open to dispute. I am sorry the Senator is not informed, but it is not open to dispute. I could name conditions in my own State where it has been done; but if the Senator will read the testimony before the committees of the House and the Senate when the Cummins bill was up he will find direct admissions of railroad men that they had done this in the past, but they said they would never do it again in the future, and yet I know of an instance that was referred to here yesterday in my own State where they deliberately gobbled up the entire division of a freight rate to destroy water competition.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if the Senator has in mind a particular instance which he says he knows about of his own knowledge, I should be far from disputing anything the Senator might say in regard to the matter. I know that if he has examined it, he states it as it is; but I utterly dispute the proposition that the railroads of this country generally have reduced freight rates to a point where they can not afford to carry the freight.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not talking about the general freight rates that they charge. I am talking about the competitive rates at points where they compete with water; and then they have raised the rates back in the hinterland to people who were not on the water, and made them pay enough to make the railroad pay. The people outside had to carry the burden until the water competition was destroyed, and then they went back to the old freight rates, until some years ago Congress passed a law saying that where they reduced the rate they could not put it up.

As I said yesterday, it is just as natural for railroad management to go out to destroy river competition with a railroad as it is for a dog to chase a cat. The only difference is that the railroad dog usually catches the river cat. That is the real truth about this matter.

We shall have to go back to the plan followed by every other country. The great countries of Europe are carrying the bulk of their freight to the sea by water transportation, even through artificial canals.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission has connived at the actions of the railroads in reducing freight rates for the specific purpose of destroying competition in some streams?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Interstate Commerce Commission has done what the law allowed it to do. The law does it. The fault lies right here, right in the center of this aisle. It is because there have been too many people who would not wake up to the fact that we are entitled to water transportation, and they allowed this law to stand on the statute books. The American people never will have a fair opportunity to get the advantage of cheap water transportation to carry their products to the sea until the American Congress repeals some of the laws in which it has authorized this unjust competition.

Mr. BORAH. What is the defect of the law dealing with the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission which permits the railroads to do this without the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not quote the clause verbatim. The Senator will find it there.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator will find there a clause which was put in there for the specific purpose of enabling the Interstate Commerce Commission to deal with just that kind of a situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure.

Mr. BORAH. If it is not sufficient and efficient to do that, we ought to be advised of it, because the intent of Congress was to prevent that very thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the Senator is wrong.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not wrong.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. BORAH. So do I.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A clause was put in the transportation act to authorize railroads, in the discretion of the commission, to meet competition by water. It was discretionary with the commission in the beginning. When it went in there no one expected the commission to go to the extent of giving them an unlimited right to meet water competition and destroy it; but the commission took the position away back yonder that that was what it meant, and it ran along, and on occasions they allowed the railroads to meet the competitive rate until they said the precedent was so strongly established that they could not overcome it. When the Esch-Cummins bill was passed, we attempted to change that situation and give the commission a chance to start over again and prevent this unlawful competition. So far as I am advised, they have done nothing up to this time under the power vested in the Esch-Cummins Act.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator and I agree upon the proposition that it is not the fault of the law, but that it is the fault of the commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is the fault of the law in allowing the commission any discretion at all in the matter. What the law ought to do is to prohibit the railroads from reducing rates to meet this competition. If they can not carry the freight at their ordinary and just rates of tariff, notwithstanding the river, the freight ought to go to the river, and be carried by the cheapest means of transportation.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My understanding is that the attempt on the part of the Esch-Cummins law was to modify the provision as it then existed, which was that a charge for a short distance should not be greater than one for a longer distance, the shorter being included within the longer, provided—and this was the provision—that no rate should be established that was not compensatory in itself; so that they could not fix a rate for any distance that would not be compensatory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure. The Senator sat on the committee with me, and he knows what we were driving at, and he remembers the discussion in the committee, and the witnesses that appeared before us. He knows, as I do, that the old clause under which the commission was first authorized to do this made it discretionary with the commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He knows that the commission came before us and said that that discretion had been used affirmatively to the railroads so long that it had become a precedent, and they could not overthrow it, and we attempted to change the language so that they could set a new precedent; but, as far as I am advised, they have not done so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is another proposition I am unable to understand. There is nothing at all to prevent the Interstate Commerce Commission from overruling any precedent which it has established at any time since it was organized. It has perfect power. It is all within its discretion. It can disregard, and it does disregard, its precedents, and there could not be any possible reason in law why they should not disregard any precedent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is right about that. They could, just as the Supreme Court can overrule its own decisions, but he as a lawyer and I as a lawyer know it is hard to get them to do it. When they establish a precedent they do not change it. That does not help us at all, because while they may feel they have the power they do not exercise it. Congress has invested hundreds of millions in these water-transportation routes. We know water transportation can succeed, because it has succeeded in other countries. We know it can succeed, because it succeeded in America before this unjust competition was allowed. If the commission is not willing to handle the matter, Congress should act. There is no reason why we should attempt to ignore or destroy a great system of waterways. I am in favor of continuing to build them up, as the engineers are, and to keep on building them up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My impression is that water transportation has never been able to compete with railroad transportation in a country of large distances, and even in Germany it was not able to compete, and it was recognized that it could not compete without legislation. The German Government enacted laws providing for a division of the freight between the canalized rivers and the railroads, and in Germany I understand certain freight must be shipped by waterway and can not be shipped by railroad where there is competition; so that it has required the force of law even in Germany to make water transportation possible in competition with railroads. To my mind in a great country like this, where distances are enormous, it is unreasonable to suppose that waterways can compete with railroads. It is almost a waste of money to appropriate with that hope.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, we can theorize about the matter, but a couple of years ago, when we had this question before us, I took the trouble to read the German statutes, and I did not find anything in them which would justify what the Senator from Nebraska has just said. I may not use the exact language, but I believe there are provisions in those statutes which do not allow the railroads to reduce their rates to within 20 per cent of the rates of the waterways. Water carriage is cheaper than railroad carriage, and the law does not allow the railroad to come down beyond a certain point and drive the water carriers out of business.

There can be no question about the water transportation being cheaper, when you can load on one barge as much as you can carry in two trainloads and when the barge does not cost as much as the engine of the train, and you start it down the river loaded, and it floats, or has a little tug to pull it. To say that it costs more to transport by water than to transport by rail, where you have to build miles of steel rails and carry the road through a country, pay enormous taxes, and great labor pay rolls, which you do not have in the water transportation, is really absurd, as it is to say you can not carry heavy freight cheaper by water than by rail. There is no question about it. It has been so since the beginning of rail transportation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that in the act under which the barge lines were created Congress expressly provided that they could charge 20 per cent less than the usual rates charged by the railroads between the same places, and that discrimination is the law; but the railroads, just as the Senator has said, have so reduced their rates, and have insisted upon such an unfair division of rates, as virtually to put the line, especially about which we are talking, out of business.

Mr. BORAH. I would like to ask the Senator from Tennessee where the railroads have thus reduced their rates?

Mr. McKELLAR. Only when they come in competition with these river lines, which they want to destroy.

Mr. BORAH. Where is that?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is on the Warrior River especially.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that, of course, they destroyed water competition a decade or two ago. They destroyed it down the Ohio, they destroyed it down the Mississippi, they destroyed it down the Warrior, and they accomplished that result along most of the great rivers of the Mississippi Valley. There is no question about that having been done in the past. They have not had to do it in recent years, and have not done it in recent years, because they had nobody to compete with except the Government.

Mr. BORAH. The time the rivers were carrying most of the freight was the time when we were spending the least amount of money on them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be true, because the railroads did not compete with them; they did not start this ruinous competition which the people of the hinterland had to pay for.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama, and also of the Senator from Idaho, to the fact that recently the railroads actually reduced the freight rate on grain going down the river to New Orleans from the upper valley 5 cents a hundred, and the shippers are enjoying that cut now, getting more return by reason of that reduction in the rate than the amount of money to be appropriated in this bill for this purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no doubt about that. My friend from Idaho, whom I respect, and whom I always find is accurate where he has taken the trouble to investigate, of course lives among the mountain peaks. This question has not been next door to him, as it has been next door to us; and when our system of transportation in the valleys was destroyed, he was looking above those who live down in the valleys and did not see what was happening.

Mr. BORAH. I have seen the Senator all the time, and I always greatly admire him, but the reduction which the able Senator from Arkansas has spoken of leads me to say that we had a reduction out West, where there are no rivers, to meet certain local conditions. I have been interested in water transportation ever since the building of the Panama Canal, and I have been trying to have passage of American ships through the Panama Canal made free. I have undertaken to familiarize myself with that subject, but I have been unable to find where of late the railroads have reduced their freight rates for the purpose of destroying water competition, and I do not believe any instance can be cited where that has been done for many, many years.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that the Senator was probably right in that statement as regards the last decade, although I think I could find instances; but the business was dead 10 years and more ago.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to have died after they began to feed it out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me give one illustration. I live 103 miles north of Helena, Ark., and because the railroad running near my town has no competition I could formerly ship from Helena to St. Louis for just about half as much as I could ship from my town, because they have the river competition into Helena.

Mr. BORAH. We come back to the question, Where is the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CARAWAY. It is down here on Pennsylvania Avenue and Eighteenth Street; but I do not want to be facetious—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I do not want to interrupt him, but I think sometimes the Interstate Commerce Commission is living in the mountains and can not see us in the valleys.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say to the Senator that if he lived out in the mountain region he would think differently.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not speaking about the policy of the commission; but there was a recognized right of the railroads to meet what they called water competition. It was legal, under the ruling of the commission, up to within a comparatively few years, and if one imagines there was not such competition, he ought to go and compare the rates on the railroad and on the river. The water rates were approximately 50 per cent of the rail rates. The gentleman sitting to my right lives on the White River. We improved the White River for a short distance, and then they built a line of railroad right alongside it, and operated the railroad absolutely at a loss all the time until they destroyed the last bit of water competition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know the Senator from Idaho is perfectly sincere in what he says, but he simply does not know the facts. What the Senator from Arkansas has said I know to be true. I know it is true in my State. There is not a man who lives in the Mississippi Valley along these rivers who does not know that the railroads have deliberately gone out to destroy water competition, and largely because Congress has permitted it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we can not escape the fact, then, that the Interstate Commerce Commission has connived at the crime.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not willing to give the Interstate Commerce Commission an entire acquittal. I do not say that they are entirely to blame; I think some of the blame lies at our own doors. At any rate, I think there was no justification for it, but I am not willing to abandon these water routes because either the Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission has been derelict in its duty to the American people in seeing that they are protected against this unjust and unfair competition, and the natural, cheap means of transportation of their products to the sea has been destroyed.

What I rose to say was this, and I say it in all good part: That since I have been in Congress I have continually listened to attacks from gentlemen coming from the great mountain country on the rivers of the country and appropriations for their improvement. I think the first thing I ever heard sung in the House of Representatives was an attack because of "macadamizing" creeks in the Mississippi Valley.

There may have been a time when unwarranted appropriations were made, but everybody knows that for the last decade appropriations do not get into these bills until they have been carefully supervised by the engineers of the United States Government, who have no personal interest in them, and when money has been expended on river and harbor projects it has brought a depth of water that actually justified transportation if the ships were allowed to run.

The men who come from the Mississippi Valley, as I do, have never made war on the great mountain regions of the West. I sat on the Committee on Irrigation in the House of Representatives, when it was equally divided, at the time the great irrigation bill was reported to the House. That bill came out of the committee by one vote; and if I had cast my vote the other way it would not have been reported, but I voted for it. When it came into the House of Representatives to be made a law, practically the entire membership from the South, men who lived in the Mississippi Valley cast their votes in favor of the bill and made it a law, and gave that great western country a chance to grow and develop.

Whenever the great West has appealed to the South on a fair, economic question involving their growth and development, they have found our people standing with them; and yet every time this question has come up, the most vital question to us, a question of ultimate cheap transportation for the products of our fields to the market and the world's market, where we have to compete with the competition of the world, I find that the men who have called for our help are the first to denounce and attempt to destroy the one feature concerning us to be found in these bills of vital economic importance to us. Where are the appropriations that amount to anything that go South outside of this one item? Where are they spent? I do not mean the appropriations made in war times, because we built some camps there then; but ordinarily where do they go?

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator what appropriations go to the North any more than go to the South?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not criticizing their going to the North.

Mr. LENROOT. But what appropriations do go to the North that do not equally affect the South?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But they are not spent in the South and the South is not benefited. Most of them do not go to the Senator's part of the country any more than they go to mine, but they go to the North. The only great appropriation that we get in the Southland that is of vital importance to the economic question involved for our people, and it is an important question, is the one we are discussing now. We are not asking to compete with the North. We are asking that the door may be opened for us to get to the sea, but every time we ask it and the proposition comes here in a bill we are challenged at the door by men who ask our help and to whom we have been giving help for many years in their own economic questions.

I do not see the justice of it. I think when the engineers make an estimate of this kind, and when it is for the development of the rivers, that we are entitled to have it retained in the bill, that it should not be thrown out of the bill simply because somebody says freight is not moving on the rivers when we know why it is not moving there. It is because we have allowed competition coming from the great railroad lines of the country to destroy our water transportation. I think the thing Congress should do, instead of criticizing the development of our rivers, is to correct the law so the barge lines and steamboats may live on the rivers in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, Clark, who was president of the old Illinois Central, said the physical configuration of the country was such that if one started a barrel of flour from St. Paul it would roll to the Gulf of Mexico. Of course, there are obstructions here and there that would do away with that theory, but undoubtedly New Orleans has been placed just where it ought to have been, the great export point of the United States for grain and meats and agricultural products. There flow to it the Missouri, the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Allegheny, the Monongahela, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, all the rivers that compose the great valley, and yet the commerce upon the great Mississippi River does not compare with that upon the Rhine in Germany. I want to direct a few minutes to pointing out why.

Bismarck had a great many faults, but his worst enemy never accused him of being a fool. When they came to the question of competition between the railroads and the Rhine and the other rivers that pass through Germany into the German Sea or into the Baltic, Bismarck always insisted that the rivers should carry their share of commerce. He said that result could be achieved by simply not discriminating against them. That was all that was necessary. So, as a matter of fact, in 1914, when the Great War began, the Rhine was carrying the iron ore, the coal, the lumber, and all the heavy materials, and was doing an infinitely large business. Although there were railroads on each side of the Rhine, they were not congested. The waterways naturally took the heavy stuff with the cheap freight rates, where expedition of delivery was not a point or the main point even to be considered, while the railroads took the other things.

Now, what has happened here?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The river of which the Senator speaks runs in the direction in which the railroads run. But suppose the Senator wanted to get some freight from Pittsburgh, Pa., to Portland, Oreg., how would he get it there upon the same theory?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It could not be done; but I am not contending that it should be done. However, it has nothing to do with the proposition.

So much for the German history of great river traffic. Now, let me come to the American history of it. This time it is the Mississippi River. The gentleman from Texas, or a Member of the House of Representatives, who had been Postmaster General of the Confederacy, sent over to the Senate the Reagan bill establishing the Interstate Commerce Commission or a national railroad commission. One of the provisions in that bill was that under no circumstances should a higher charge be made for a short haul—this is answering the Senator's question—than for a longer haul in the same direction. Then when the bill got over here, that inimitable legislator, John Sherman, of Ohio, got an amendment upon the bill and put in the seemingly innocent words "under similar circumstances" or "under similar conditions." I have forgotten the exact language; I think it was "similar circumstances," but it may have been "similar conditions."

Thereupon the Interstate Commerce Commission ruled that notwithstanding the long-and-short-haul provision, the principle of the ethics of business was that a railroad had a right to compete with a waterway and charge less without reducing its intermediate freight rates, and the consequence was that they could charge a railway rate from St. Paul to Vicksburg, Miss., or to New Orleans to compete with the river rates, although every individual shipment competing with the river rates was a loss so far as it itself was concerned. The only way in which the railroads made money out of it was that it kept up their general business, and as the haul was so long and there was no interference with it along the route they could charge almost any freight rate provided they did not reduce the freight rates between intermediate points on hauls in the same direction.

Then I and some others began—or rather, I should have said, when some others and I began, because they began at an earlier time and contributed much more to it—to endeavor to deprive the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power to enable the railroad to cut its rates wherever it struck a river while it did not cut intermediate rates or rates for equal distances to points that did not strike a river. Finally an amendment to that effect was adopted in the House. It came over here and was amended then by leaving it to the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission has exercised its discretion in favor of the railroads and against the rivers all the time.

Now nobody has demanded any discrimination. All we are demanding is that nature shall take its course, and that the advantage which nature has given to certain places shall not be destroyed by artificial legislation. Notwithstanding all that discrimination, in spite of all this discrimination New Orleans is to-day the second largest port of export in the United States, showing what nature would have done if legislation had not interfered. According to old Clark's theory, a barrel of flour started at St. Paul would roll to the Gulf, or come mightily near it, and if it were started from Cincinnati or Pittsburgh, on the other side to the east, it would pretty nearly roll to the Gulf, and started at the headwaters of the Missouri it would pretty nearly roll to the Gulf, and started down the Red below it would roll pretty close to some point on the Gulf, and started down the Pearl or the Lee it would roll to the Gulf, though, of course, not to New Orleans.

Here is this great, remarkable fan of waterways stretching from the Rocky Mountains on the one side to the top of the Alleghenies on the other, narrowing more and more as it goes southward until when we get to New Orleans it is a very narrow place. The Leaf and the Pearl flow directly into the Gulf on the one side of a small ridge, not a very high ridge, and other streams, the Sabine and others, flow into the Gulf on the west side of another not very high ridge. But as a whole it starts like the points of a great fan and comes down, narrowing as it comes, but it brings the water from the Rockies and the Alleghenies and empties it through a funnel into the lower part of the Mississippi Valley.

We have interfered with it so that it has nearly crippled what ought to be the great ocean bearing auxiliary of America, the great ocean's first assistant in the commerce of these United States. We have not been able to do it completely, because New Orleans is second as an export point, but we have done a great deal toward doing it.

Now, if we had obeyed a wise policy, such as was followed in Germany, two things would have occurred. First, the north and south railways would not have been congested with freight to such an extent that it would take from 10 to 15 days to carry a carload of freight from New York down to Mobile, to New Orleans, to Galveston, to almost any point on the Gulf coast. So we have crippled the railways somewhat as commerce feeders, and we have deprived the river of the burden of its commerce. We have done both. I remember that James J. Hill, the great railway man, said that if some one came to him with an offer that he should deliver 50 carloads of freight from New Orleans to New York within 25 days he would be compelled to refuse it if he had the management of every line that would handle the freight.

Why was that? It was because we had allowed the railroads to make a discrimination against the intermediate points in favor of river points and water points by charging less than the cost of the haul, and we have thereby congested them while we have emasculated the river. Now, suppose we quit both. Give a chance to nature to assert itself. That is not claiming any discrimination. When people have a natural advantage they ought to be allowed to enjoy it. Legislation ought not to destroy a natural advantage, wherever it may be. If we should simply make the rule that wherever a railroad charges a certain rate from one point to another it shall charge no higher rate of freight from the first point to any intermediate point than it charges to the other, that would be a wise rule.

What has been the result of a whole lot of this action on our part? I remember the time when it was solemnly asserted and alleged, and affidavits were made to support it, and I suppose it was true, that it paid men to ship freight from New York to San Francisco, a water point, and then ship it back to Helena, Mont., rather than to ship it from New York to Helena direct. They said that was true. I do not know whether it was or not. I never went fully into the question, but I read the evidence. There were affidavits, and people with tolerable good repute swore to them, to the effect that people would absolutely have their goods shipped from New York to San Francisco and then shipped back to Helena, Mont., and get a much cheaper rate than if they had shipped direct from New York to Helena.

Then some of them conceived the idea that they would be bright and smart and Yankee-like sharp and English and Scotch like sharp in business; and so they would get a permit to take the freight off en route at Helena. But then, lo and behold, it was decided that that was a fraud, and they could not do it; that the freight had to be carried bodily all the way to San Francisco and be brought bodily all the way back. It is absurd that a man could not be allowed to take his freight off in transitu when the shipper and he had agreed, because by doing so they would break up the great bunko railroad game which was playing the shipper for all he was worth.

Mr. GOODING. I am quite sure the Senator is stating the facts in connection with the matter. Not only did that happen as to Helena but it also happened in practically all of the interior States of the West.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At any rate, from my cursory reading of the testimony I believed it at the time to be true. I do not know, however, and I do not wish to vouch for anything I do not know.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have no doubt that things have been done by the railroads in order to destroy water competition exactly as has been alleged upon this floor; but the fault for the disappearance of water-borne commerce upon many of the rivers of this country has not been altogether that of the railroads. It seems to me so plain that every Senator must recognize it, that one of the reasons for the decline of traffic upon the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers, for instance, is the fact that in the days when there was a great volume of commerce on those rivers there was no other way by which products could be carried either up or down in that territory; there were no railroads. Then, when the railroads came, rail transportation became cheaper than any possible water transportation where the haul was very short, where the shipment originated inland, and not upon a river point, and where the destination was not upon the water but inland. In other words, where there has to be a shipment by rail to a water point, a short haul by water, and the goods then have to be unloaded and again shipped by railroad cars, in such a case there can be no economy in water transportation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I merely wish to call his attention to the fact that goods shipped from New York to the city of Birmingham, Ala., coming to Mobile, there transferred to barge lines, and then again transferred to the railroad at Tuscaloosa, and thence to Birmingham, are carried at a cheaper freight rate than the all-rail freight rate. That is not a theory. A great deal of the goods that go into the stores of the merchants of Birmingham come by water on the Mallory Line steamships to Mobile, and up the Warrior River into Birmingham by way of Tuscaloosa; so that, although the Senator from Wisconsin may be correct in regard to some matters about which I do not know, I do know that he is incorrect in reference to this particular matter.

Mr. LENROOT. What the Senator from Alabama has stated might have happened in a particular case; but does the Senator dispute my contention as an economic proposition? I was only stating it as an economic proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, there are a great many elements involved. I think that under some circumstances the Senator's statement may be true, but under other circumstances it would not be. Now I will give the Senator an illustration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Wisconsin said that freight might be hauled by water cheaper when it was not transferred to railroads, but that when there was an intermediate transfer to railroads the all-rail rate was cheaper.

Mr. LENROOT. I stated when there was a short haul by water.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the case of a short haul by water. Of course, it depends upon the length or shortness of the haul.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the point. I was just about to complete my statement. There must be a long enough haul by water so that the cheaper water transportation upon that part of it will more than absorb the extra handling charge involved in the intermediate rail shipments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proposition about which I am talking involves a comparatively long haul. I wish, by way of illustration, to cite another instance, though, it is true, a pretty long water haul is involved. The greatest movement of freight of which I know in this country is the transfer of iron ore from the State of the Senator from Wisconsin and from Minnesota to the furnaces in Pittsburgh. That movement starts with a short railroad haul, then the freight goes across the Great Lakes; it is then unloaded and goes by rail to Pittsburgh. It is transported twice by rail and once by water and, of course, has got to be unloaded and reloaded at each transfer. That instance demonstrates that such transportation may be done and is successfully done. More than that, the Pittsburgh furnaces could not use that ore if they did not have the advantage of the water transportation.

Mr. LENROOT. That is a perfect illustration of the very point that I am trying to make.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield in just a moment.

Water transportation upon the Lakes has been so successful and the railroads have not been able to crush transportation upon the Lakes because the economies have been so great that the railroads could not do it; but the haul is long enough so as much more than to absorb the extra handling charge. Wherever that is true, and we can improve a river or a harbor at a reasonable cost, so that the additional charge is not merely paid out of the Public Treasury and eventually there is no saving at all—in all such cases we are justified in making such improvements.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I am arguing for to-day are the items in the pending bill which relate to the Mississippi River. Of course, so far as the Warrior River, to which I have referred, is concerned, that improvement has been completed and has been paid for; we are not asking for any appropriations for that; but we merely wish an opportunity to do business.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is rather anticipating some objections which he thinks I may make, but which, perhaps, he will find that I shall not make.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As to water transportation, we have it by sea from New York to Mobile and for almost 300 miles from Mobile to Birmingham; while down the Mississippi and its tributaries there are 2,000 miles of water transportation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Five thousand miles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Louisiana says 5,000 miles, and I have no doubt he is correct, including the Mississippi and its tributaries. So that there is a long water haul. Of course, in the case of a very short haul, the Senator may be correct. We are not, however, pleading for that; we are pleading for an opportunity to vitalize water transportation in the very instance where the Senator himself admits that it may be developed.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will allow me to develop the argument I was making, perhaps we shall not disagree. I perfectly agree that if we can upon the Mississippi River develop commerce to New Orleans on a long enough haul so as to absorb the extra costs of which I have spoken, then transportation over the Mississippi, with the proper regulation of railroad rates upon the part of the Government, will be a success; but we have got to have the long haul, and I think we must look for success on the Mississippi River principally to shipments through to New Orleans for foreign export. We can not expect any great commerce to be developed upon the Mississippi River at any point where the haul is only 100 miles or 200 miles or 300 miles along the river and then the goods have to be transported inland, coming in the first place by railroad to the initial point upon which the water shipment is made. That is why I am anxious to have the Mississippi River completed and put in the best possible condition from St. Louis to New Orleans. I want to see the Ohio River completed and put in the best possible condition so that there will be a completed channel to New Orleans. Then, I say that if that is not successful—and by successful I mean taking into consideration the cost each year to the Government of maintaining the river—then, it is simply absurd to expect any benefits from the improvement of the Missouri River or the upper Mississippi River. I think I have now made my point clear to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have no objection to the statement which the Senator makes in regard to that feature of the case, because I think he is correct. But we are not asking to have rivers "macadamized"; we are not asking to do an impossible thing; we are only asking for a fair chance for the development of a great natural resource that may be made profitable.

Mr. LENROOT. The trouble with the Senator is that he makes the assumption that it can be made profitable, but that has not yet been proven.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was profitable in the past before undue competition was put against it, and while, of course, the future must prove the fact, I can not do so; yet I have not a doubt in my mind that those rivers would be alive with barge lines and steamboats carrying the commerce of that great valley to the sea within a decade if the Congress would give them a chance.

Mr. LENROOT. I hope the Senator is correct, yet it must be noted that there has been practically a complete channel from St. Louis to New Orleans for a good many years, and the commerce has been very slow in developing. It has been impossible to get any private capital to engage in it, and the Government itself has been compelled to do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not now speaking of the appropriation, but I am speaking of the undue and destructive competition that Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission—one or the other—has invited as against these waterways.

Mr. LENROOT. I am speaking about what the Senator intimates, that there are no items in this bill that are in accord with the theory which I have just presented.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not familiar with all the items, because this is a general appropriation and I have not given careful and detailed study to all the items. I assume they are correct, as they come here with the recommendation of the Government engineers.

Mr. LENROOT. I have just stated that I hope to see and I want to see the Mississippi a success, and I want to see the Ohio River a success.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks there is any chance for water competition on our rivers so long as we permit a violation of the fourth section of the interstate commerce law? There are 12,000 violations of that law to-day where the railroads in this country have been permitted to charge more for a short haul than for a long haul. Surely there can not be any doubt in the mind of any Senator that such violations of the interstate commerce act have destroyed water transportation on our rivers. I do not care how much money may be spent for improving rivers, unless water transportation is protected through legislation it can not exist in America.

I wish to say further to the Senator that the railroads have not only destroyed transportation on the rivers, but they have destroyed coastwise transportation from the West. We are not permitted to ship freight from Portland or Seattle or San Francisco to any extent at all, especially from the interior, because the railroads make the rate so high, two or three times on a mileage basis what the rates are in the East, that they force all of our farm products over the long haul to the eastern market. This policy of the railroads brings about a great congestion and shortage of cars everywhere when the farm products are moving to market. Through this policy of charging excessive freight rates for the short haul to the Pacific coast the people of my State are denied the use of the Pacific Ocean which God Almighty, no doubt, intended for the use of all the people.

These excessive freight rates of the West denied the people of my State the use of the Panama Canal which they were taxed to help build as well as the rest of the people.

Practically all of Idaho's farm products should be shipped to Portland to receive the benefit of water transportation and if we were given a reasonable freight rate, or anywhere near as cheap a freight rate to the West on a mileage basis as to the East, all of our wheat and many other farm products would receive the benefit of water transportation.

I introduced a bill some time in December denying the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to violate the fourth section of the interstate commerce act; but, unfortunately, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee has been ill and there has been no hearing, and I do not suppose there will be one on this measure at this session, but until we change our laws so as to deny to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to make these violations, all this money that we spend to improve our rivers is not wasted, of course, but to a large extent it will be impossible to develop anything like an adequate commerce.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am not going into that question, although the Senator of course is familiar with the argument which has been made by the railroads affecting his own country, too; and I am not going to express any opinion on it, other than to say that the situation narrated by the Senator from Mississippi, where some years ago they charged the San Francisco rate plus the local rate back and then simply shipped the freight out from the East to that point, was absolutely indefensible. Of course, however, the Senator is familiar with the claim that is made, that where this lower rate has been granted by reason of water competition, it is upon the theory that the traffic would be lost entirely to the railroads; that it costs so much to maintain a railroad, its track and equipment, its section men and its overhead, and therefore it is no injury but a benefit to those who do live in the interior to permit a somewhat lower rate where water competition exists, so as to get the traffic, and enable that traffic to bear part of the cost of the overhead, although in itself it may not be profitable.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that we do not accept that claim in the West at all.

Mr. LENROOT. I know you do not.

Mr. GOODING. My people lost 10,000 carloads of potatoes this year because they were not given a freight rate that would enable them to move them to market. I saw wheat stacked up in the fields for three months because there was no transportation to carry it to market. We do not accept that theory at all.

Mr. LENROOT. I know the Senator does not, and I do not—

Mr. GOODING. The people of the West do not.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not accept it to the extent that the railroads have invoked it either; and yet I can see that to have an iron-clad rule practically putting the freight of this country upon a mileage basis might work to the injury of the very people of whom the Senator from Idaho speaks and whom he desires, of course, to benefit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will yield, there has been much discussion here to-day as to the status of the law relative to the so-called long and short haul. The Senator from Mississippi has practically stated correctly the history of the interstate commerce law in reference to the matter. I want to read for the RECORD, if the Senator will permit me, section 4 of the act of 1920, which was the last statement of the Congress relative to the law for handling freight on the long and short haul.

The act of 1920 amended section 4 of the interstate commerce law itself, and as amended the section reads as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act, but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, That upon application to the commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section; but in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from the more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory for the service performed; and if a circuitous rail line or route is, because of such circuitry, granted authority to meet the charges of a more direct line or route to or from competitive points and to maintain higher charges to or from intermediate points on its line, the authority shall not include intermediate points as to which the haul of the petitioning line or route is not longer than that of the direct line or route between the competitive points; and no such authorization shall be granted on account of merely potential water competition not actually in existence—

And so forth. That is the present law relative to the long and short haul.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator I was about to state that since the passage of the Esch-Cummins law, if the commission performs its duty, there can be no such thing in the future as has been complained of this afternoon.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator let me correct him?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. I said since the passage of the Esch-Cummins law.

Mr. GOODING. Within the last six months we have had a rate on wool from Portland to Boston of $1.50 a hundred; from Shoshone, Idaho, 608 miles inland, nearer Boston, the rate has been $2.81 a hundred; so that is a violation of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act, and that is within the last six months.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That can not be a violation of the section unless the $1.50 rate is not compensatory in itself.

Mr. GOODING. Well, then, if $1.50 is a compensatory rate, what is the $2.81? It is robbery.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, if the $1.50 is compensatory to Boston, the other rate is too high and should be reduced by the commission. That is the answer, of course.

Mr. President, this being a general lump-sum appropriation, the Senator from Alabama took it for granted that there were no appropriations in this bill that if expended would not without question benefit navigation to a degree commensurate with the cost. I want to spend a moment on the Missouri River.

Of this $56,000,000, $1,500,000 will be spent upon the Missouri River—$500,000 for maintenance, $1,000,000 for improvement—and I am going to speak only of the maintenance item now. The commerce carried on the Missouri River last year, according to the table placed in the Record and according to the Engineer's Report, was 139,000 tons. That is practically $4 a ton that the Government has contributed out of the Treasury of the United States to enable that amount of commerce to be carried by water. As a matter of fact, the major part of that 139,000 tons is sand and gravel, I am informed; but we have improved only a very small part of the Missouri River. The entire improvement will cost more than $20,000,000; and on the small part that we have improved it is proposed to expend out of the estimate of one million and a half dollars $225,000 for repairs to existing dikes and revetments.

When the entire $20,000,000 is expended, and it is all diked and revetted, how much is it going to cost to maintain the Missouri River each year? According to these figures, it will cost not less than a million dollars a year to maintain that river after we have completed the improvement.

Suppose that the shippers do save a million dollars a year by reason of the commerce that will be carried on the Missouri River. Is the Government justified in making the improvement then unless there be a greater saving than that? Can anybody ask this Government to pay out of its Treasury a sum of money where the saving will not be greater than the amount that it has cost the taxpayers? I think that is a fair question; but so far as we can foresee now, Mr. President, the time probably will never come, or at least—I do not want to put it so strongly—certainly the time will not come within the next 10 years when there will be enough commerce on the Missouri River to justify a $20,000,000 improvement project and $1,000,000 maintenance each year.

On the Mississippi River we have a different proposition. The cost of maintenance is not nearly so great, and the commerce that will go down the Ohio River is of such magnitude, I believe, that we may hope for that being a success; but I repeat that if the Mississippi River and the Ohio River will not be commercially successful, who is there that will predict that the Missouri River would be commercially successful?

The same thing is true of the upper Mississippi, in my own country. In this $56,000,000 there is included an item of $1,100,000 for the improvement of the upper Mississippi. I take exactly the same position with reference to that that I do with reference to the Missouri, although the upper Mississippi for several hundred miles runs along the borders of the State that I have the honor in part to represent. It will be time enough to put in these millions when we determine that the lower Mississippi is a commercially successful project; but until that time we had better save the money of the taxpayers, because the upper Mississippi River will not get worse, and if the improvement down below does not warrant the cost we shall have just thrown away our money upon the upper river.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a minute?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I notice that the upper Mississippi River, between the Missouri River and Minneapolis, carried last year 761,522 tons of freight, and yet we find it in this very situation, if I may read just one paragraph. I will take only a minute of the Senator's time.

Mr. LENROOT. All right.

Mr. CARAWAY. Last April there was to have been a barge line put on the upper Mississippi River between Minneapolis and St. Louis. In anticipation of this barge-line service the rail line paralleling the river between Minneapolis and St. Louis early this year, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made a rate upon first-class freight of $1.06½ per 100 pounds over a distance of 586 miles, while the rail rate from Minneapolis to Kansas City, over a more level country, a distance of 500 miles, was $1.44. In anticipation of a possible competing line on the Mississippi, they cut the freight 40 cents a hundred.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator objects to the reduction of freight rates or not. Under the law, they are not permitted to reduce rates below what is compensatory.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was just trying to show that instead of using the water, however, the railroads, knowing that the rate could be reduced, cut the rate.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be; only the answer is, it ought to be cut in the other portion of the country.

Mr. CARAWAY. I agree with the statement the Senator was making a minute ago, but I am showing that here are nearly 800,000 tons of freight carried on the upper Mississippi River despite these conditions.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator inform the Senate as to the character of the commerce carried on the upper Mississippi River and the distance it is carried?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure I do not know.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will find that most of it is carried across the river by ferries at different points between cities. There is no appreciable commerce from St. Paul, the head of navigation, down the Mississippi River.

Mr. CARAWAY. All I know, of course, is the figures given by the engineers in their reports. I do not know the character of the freight.

Mr. LENROOT. I may say that I have in my possession—I have not them with me—resolutions passed by one of the considerable cities bordering on the Mississippi River asking that further money be not expended upon the Mississippi River unless and until a barge line is put upon the river that will produce commerce. It is of no benefit to any city in Wisconsin bordering upon the Mississippi River, except so far as the wages that the men get may be spent in the city, to have this improvement if no commerce is carried over the river.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was just calling the Senator's attention to the fact that the mere threat of putting a barge line on the Mississippi River reduced the freight from Minneapolis to St. Louis from $1.44 a hundred to $1.06½ a hundred.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator state where he got that information?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am taking the information from a report filed by Mr. Newton of Missouri, who put it in the Record of January 20.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it his statement or the statement of the Board of Engineers?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am unable to answer that. He was giving a statement of actual conditions.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to have the facts before I undertook to discuss it. Of course, the fact that a reduction might have gone into effect, and that previous to that time there was a promise to put a barge line on the river, might have been a coincidence, or the barge line might have been the reason for the reduction.

Mr. CARAWAY. The real facts are that the freight rate from New Orleans to St. Louis is $1.06½ for 580 miles paralleling the river. From Minneapolis to Kansas City, only 500 miles and over a more level route, the freight rate is $1.44, which would, of course, leave no room for speculation as to why the rate was reduced along the river. It was to prevent the establishment of a barge line. It was to kill competition.

Mr. LENROOT. Again I say that if that rate is itself compensatory nobody can object, but if that rate is compensatory the rate west of Kansas City is more than compensatory and ought to be reduced.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the point.

Mr. KING. Referring to the matter of the Mississippi River and the Missouri River, the Senator, in discussing some time ago the improvements upon the Mississippi River, made the statement—or I inferred from his statement—that additional improvements are needed on the Mississippi River to carry commerce. I want to ask the Senator, because he is more familiar with that than I am, why it is necessary to make improvements there for carrying commerce, even though the commerce might be greatly increased, when we take into account that in the forties and fifties and sixties and seventies the commerce upon the Mississippi River was very much greater, as I am advised, than it is now, and boats of considerable size piled up and down the river? There seemed to be no obstacles then to commerce, and very little, if any, sums were appropriated in the early days for canalization, for removing sand bars, or for improvements. The river itself was sufficiently large to carry the commerce, and if it was large enough to carry the commerce then, which was very much greater than the commerce now, why the necessity of millions and tens of millions of dollars of additional appropriations?

Mr. LENROOT. I think perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber when I began my statement. I tried then to give the reason for the large commerce in the early days and the reason for the decline, the decline being in part due to the fact that the reduction of rates on railroads drove the commerce off the river and in part due to the fact that originally water was the only means by which commerce could be transported. In the early days there were no railroads; but if the origin of shipment is inland, away from the river, and the haul upon the river is a short haul and the destination is away from the river, it is actually cheaper to ship by rail than by water.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that, and I think I agree with the observation of the Senator, but the point I am trying to make is that if appropriations were made for improvement or maintenance, they were insignificant in amount measured by the appropriations for the past 20 or 30 years for improvements upon the Mississippi River, and if without appropriations for improvement or maintenance the volume of commerce which could be carried in those early days was in excess of that which is now carried why make additional improvements?

Mr. LENROOT. Because in the early days in point of tons the cost was very small indeed for each boat, but now the greater the draft the greater the tonnage of your barge, and the greater the tonnage of your barge the cheaper it can be operated. Of course, commerce can not be carried over a river with a 3-foot draft as cheaply as it can over a river with a 6-foot draft, and that is still more true of a river with a 9-foot draft. On the Great Lakes, with our tremendous commerce, I will say in passing that more commerce goes in and out of my own city of Superior, in connecting with Duluth, just across the way, than is handled, according to some of these tables, in all the so-called secondary rivers and harbors put together.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean that the boats which are now used upon the Mississippi River are so much larger than those which were used in the early days that they could not have been floated down the river in those days?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; in those early days they had a 2 or 3 foot draft.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that some of those boats carried considerable tonnage, and while the boats used now are larger and carry a greater tonnage, they are so constructed as not to require very deep water; they are flat-bottomed, in other words.

Mr. LENROOT. They are flat-bottomed. I want to spend a moment now upon the question as to what part of this $56,000,000 will be used in the way of maintenance of some of our rivers, and the commerce that is carried on them. The hour is late, and I am going to refer to only a few.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume the Senator is going to refer to the projects which are mentioned in this report as finished, in a large measure?

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to refer only to those where the appropriation is made for maintenance. I am not going to discuss any item where the appropriation is for improvement. Take, for instance, the Pamlico and Tar Rivers, of North Carolina, where it is proposed to spend $12,000 of this $56,000,000 for maintenance of those streams, upon which in 1921 there was a commerce of 624 tons. In other words, we propose to expend out of the United States Treasury about $20 a ton in this particular instance for the commerce that is carried over those rivers.

On the Red River, in Arkansas, it is proposed to expend $100,000 in maintenance, a river upon which last year there were carried 13,000 tons; or it is proposed to spend about $7.50 a ton out of the United States Treasury for the commerce that is carried over that river.

There is a river in Florida, the name of which I can not pronounce, upon which it is proposed to expend $90,000, as I read it, for maintenance, upon which 5,000 tons of commerce were carried last year.

I wish that every Senator would read this table, and especially these items for maintenance, and the figures of the commerce carried upon the rivers, and see what it is costing out of the United States Treasury to carry a few hundred or a few thousand tons of commerce upon some of the rivers.

When one objects to that, surely it can not be said that he is an enemy to the improvement of our rivers and other waterways. Indeed, the public sentiment against proper expenditures—expenditures which will clearly be beneficial to the public—has been caused by Congress being willing in some cases to have money taken out of the Treasury the expenditure of which never can be justified from the standpoint of the benefits conferred upon commerce thereby.

I do not think we ought to confine ourselves to the Budget estimate of $27,000,000 for next year, and I want to say that while I have stood and shall continue to stand by the Budget, I have never taken the position that, so far as Congress itself is concerned, Congress is without power or without right to increase an estimate made by the Budget. Our committee have done it in a number of instances at this session; but there should be the strongest reason, it seems to me, for so doing, and there ought to be a full investigation before it is done.

I do not think it is necessary that we should appropriate $56,000,000 for the purposes of this river and harbor work. I believe that could be cut down without any injury to any legitimate project now authorized by law, but I am afraid that the Budget officer forgot for the moment that last year we authorized 35 new projects, and that those projects were projects of the utmost importance, as certified by the Board of Engineers, most of them more important than the vast majority of old projects in the pending bill. It is proposed to spend $13,000,000, in round numbers, upon those new projects. We appropriated $42,000,000 last year without any of these new projects. So, Mr. President, if those new projects are to be commenced and many of them completed within the year, assuming that $13,000,000 is spent on the 35 important and urgent projects, it would leave only $14,000,000 for maintenance and for carrying on the work on projects existing before the passage of the last law; and that sum is too small.

I shall propose as an amendment to the amendment to strike out "$27,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$42,000,000." I believe that will permit cutting out of the bill items which can not be defended, and for which I do not blame the engineers—Congress is to blame, not they—and at the same time afford ample funds for the carrying on of the projects which are necessary for commerce and can clearly be justified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moses in the chair). Will the Senator state his amendment to the amendment for the benefit of the Chair?

Mr. LENROOT. I move to strike out "$27,000,000" and to insert "$42,000,000."

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated in his concluding sentence that for the recommendations of the engineers he did not blame them. In view of the items to which he has directed attention, and numerous other items which are just as reprehensible and just as indefensible, I ask the Senator how he can justify the conduct of the engineers in recommending appropriations for those items? Furthermore, how can he justify the action of the engineers in recommending 35 new projects for which provision is made in the bill? How can he justify the recommendation of the engineers for 165 new projects, many of which are as lacking in merit as any of the projects to which the Senator has called the attention of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. In reply I will say, first, that the Senator has observed that I have not attempted to defend the engineers in their original recommendations, but after Congress has once adopted the recommendations for improvement and maintenance thereafter, then the engineers are justified in assuming that it is a policy which has been adopted by Congress, and that they should make such estimates as are necessary to carry out the policy once adopted.

With reference to new projects, I may say that I am a member of the Committee on Commerce. We went carefully into every one of the 35 proposed projects. I think, out of something like 200, every one of the 35 which have been recommended is very urgent in character, that they are necessary; but as to the 106, or whatever the number may be, I wish to say frankly to the Senator from Utah that, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I shall not be ready to vote for the authorization of those projects unless there be a showing that will clearly justify them.

Mr. KING. As I recall, one of the 35 projects on which the Senator now places the seal of his approval is Jamaica Bay, which has a few tons of freight, local in character. There are a few buildings upon the bay, so called. The freight was hauled from there, and a wharf was erected by the manufacturers who have little plants there. It would cost in the neighborhood of $11,000,000 to $12,000,000, as I recall. Does the Senator indorse that project?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is amply able to take care of that, but let me give the Senator an illustration. I refer to my home city—

Mr. KING. Now the Senator—

Mr. LENROOT. Just a moment; because I am going to draw a parallel.

Mr. KING. But the Senator is not answering my question.

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to answer the Senator's question. My home city of Superior and the city of Duluth have a commerce to-day of 30,000,000 tons a year. The Government has expended some four or five million dollars there, and if it were not for the improvement made by the Government and by the two cities, instead of 30,000,000 tons of commerce a year there would not be 100,000 tons, because there would be no harbor there. Exactly the same thing is true, as the committee were convinced, of Jamaica Bay. There is a great congestion of commerce in the port of New York, and here is a bay which, when improved, as certainly as the sun shines when there are no clouds, will be immediately used for docks and shipping facilities. That is the consideration which actuated the committee. Perhaps the committee were wrong, but in that case the fact that there was no commerce had no bearing any more than we should say that we will not improve the Ohio River because there is no commerce upon it.

I am making a distinction, if the Senator pleases, between a river or a harbor that has never been improved and improvement will bring commerce upon it, and the maintenance of a river where the improvement is either complete or no improvement is contemplated. The Senator must perceive very clearly the distinction.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the argument of the Senator from Utah were sound and there had been no improvement in the great New York Harbor, there would still have been very little commerce there.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true, of course.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, speaking of his own city of Duluth—

Mr. LENROOT. Superior.

Mr. KING. Superior? I had in mind Proctor Knott's great tribute to Duluth, so that it overshadowed Superior or any of the cities in the Senator's State.

Mr. LENROOT. It did then.

Mr. KING. The fame of Duluth still lives and the glory of Superior is not yet comprehended.

Mr. LENROOT. Not yet brought to its fulfillment, but comprehended.

Mr. KING. That is beside the mark. I was about to ask the Senator if he thinks there is some duty and responsibility resting upon municipalities that are favorably situated upon harbors, and some duty and responsibility on some States within which the harbors are found, to make appropriations and development in order to improve the commerce, the riches, and the prosperity of the State, or must the Federal Government improve all the harbors?

Mr. LENROOT. I would say that where the commerce either originates in a local point or is consumed in the local point, that is true to a very large extent. Where a port is a gateway, where many millions of peoples are the beneficiaries of improvements, certainly the Senator would not say that the local municipality should bear any considerable portion of the cost.

Mr. KING. I am making no comment upon that. I was getting the Senator's view.

Mr. LENROOT. I say that where the benefit is fully local the community should bear a part of the cost, but where the benefit is for the people at large or for a vast territory it would be very unfair to have the local community bear any substantial portion of it.

Mr. KING. The Senator feels that under the power of the Federal Government to regulate commerce is implied the authority, if not the duty, or perhaps both, to expend millions of dollars taken from the taxpayers of the United States to improve rivers and harbors, to expend millions thereon, particularly, if the commerce is not local in the sense in which the Senator used the term "local."

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the Senator remembers that for many years in the history of our Government the party of which he is a distinguished member took the position and made an issue of it that internal improvements were in violation of the Constitution. But the Senator also knows that he is very lonesome in his own party now, where rivers and harbors improvements are involved, to urge the unconstitutionality of internal improvements of that character.

Mr. KING. I am not only lonesome in regard to that question but I find that I am sometimes quite lonesome with respect to other questions which involve the rights of the States as against the new federalism which has become such a menace, in my view, to the proper individualism and the proper development of the States and the proper assertion of the rights of local self-government.

But before the Senator takes his seat, if I may further impose upon his patience, some observations were made the other day by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and, as I recall, the Senator from Wisconsin took some part in the discussion, relating to the policy of putting upon the War Department appropriation bill items of appropriations for rivers and harbors. I made some suggestions as to a remedy so as to prevent what was conceded, by some Senators at least, to be a very unwise procedure.

I ask the Senator now if it would not be a wise and proper course for the Senate to strike out the entire appropriation for rivers and harbors, for the purpose of—I will not say of compelling, because I do not wish to use that expression with respect to the distinguished branch of Congress at the other end of the Capitol—but for the purpose of persuading the House of Representatives to adopt a different policy and to send us a river and harbor bill as such, not as a part of the Army appropriation bill, or a part of the naval appropriation bill, or the part of any other bill, so that the question of the amount that shall be expended for rivers and harbors may be discussed and passed upon on its own merits and not have it linked with some other bill.

The statement was made that perhaps the President of the United States would feel compelled to sign this bill, though it was understood he is opposed to the increase above the recommendations of the Budget Bureau. Does the Senator think that now is the time for the Senate to outline such a policy and to assert its right to consider a bill of such magnitude and character by itself instead of having it a part of another measure?

Mr. LENROOT. If I were anxious that Congress be called back here after the 4th of March in special session, I might be inclined to agree with the Senator; but I am not. The Senator has been a Member of the House of Representatives, as I have, and he knows how persuasive, as he puts it, such action upon the part of the Senate would be, and how little influence it would have with the end of the session about three weeks away. This is not the time to make the effort. I hope that something can be done at the next session of Congress, and perhaps it can be done through the Congress, so that the same committees may still have jurisdiction of the matter, but report a separate river and harbor bill.

Mr. KING. If I may be pardoned for the expression of a view a little at variance with that of the able Senator, the House of Representatives is in control of the Republican Party, as is the Senate. The House of Representatives knows, and the majority Members in the House know, that an Army appropriation bill is imperatively required. I can not believe, and I think the Senator will agree with me, that the majority Members would adopt a policy that would defeat the Army appropriation bill, particularly when they know that by the excision of this item from the bill it would perhaps meet the approval of the distinguished President of the United States, the great leader of the Republican Party. They know, furthermore, that there is ample time for them to take up a rivers and harbors bill and to put it through the House of Representatives as a separate measure, bring it to the Senate, and that the Senate would have opportunity to consider it and to pass it, and it could be passed in this body, and would be passed in this body, before the end of the session.

Mr. LENROOT. I will give the Senator my opinion for whatever it may be worth. Even if the conference committee or the Committee on Appropriations should be willing to agree to have this part of the bill stricken out and a new bill introduced, and if all the Republican leaders in the House of Representatives should so agree, it is my opinion that there would still be enough Republicans with an almost solid Democratic vote against the proposition which the Senator urges, so that it would be defeated. The Senator is not unaware, as I am, that there is some politics in a rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. KING. I have such confidence in the patriotism of Republicans, both in the House and in the Senate, that I feel sure that those in the House would yield to such wise and patriotic action and would segregate the two bills and would send back within a very few days a rivers and harbors bill. I am sure there are sufficient Republicans in the Senate to join in speedily passing such a bill.

Mr. LENROOT. I think we will have something of an indication of the sentiment of the Senate in that respect when we come to vote upon the pending amendment to see whether they are willing to reduce the amount at all. If the Senate is not willing to make any reduction, the Senator from Utah will agree with me that it would be utterly useless to attempt to strike out the item entirely.

Mr. KING. Except as a question of precedent. It seems to me that we are now committing ourselves to a policy that will be a sort of chain upon us in the future and may bind us at a time when it will be exceedingly irksome and when we will feel serious embarrassment.

Mr. LENROOT. This is not the first bill. This was done last year. So this is not making a precedent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LENROOT. A parliamentary inquiry. Did the Senator from Idaho call for the yeas and nays upon his amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KING. I withhold the suggestion for one moment. I wish to ask the Senator from New York, if a vote is now taken upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, if it is then his purpose to permit us to adjourn until to-morrow?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had hoped that we should vote this evening on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin and, in the event of the adoption or defeat of that amendment, that we might vote on the so-called Borah amendment. If that shall be done, I am willing to conclude the session for the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am hopeful that the Senate may at least dispose of this item to-night.

Mr. KING. We can not do that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am perfectly willing to do that, but I am beginning to despair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I am concerned, I myself spoke this afternoon for an hour, trespassing upon the time of the Senate, which is unusual, because I felt the importance of the matter; but I think this item should be disposed of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it should be disposed of before we take a recess to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I hope the Senator will hold the Senate here until this particular item in the bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is my intention, if the Senate will stand for it, to hold the Senate here so long as it is possible to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing that that shall be done.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKellar	Spencer

Brookhart	Gooding	McNary	Stanley
Broussard	Harrell	Moses	Sterling

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is necessarily absent on official business.

Mr. BROOKHART. I wish to repeat the statement that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Brooklyn, N. Y., urging that the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Appropriations be agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., January 29, 1923.

WILLIAM M. CALDER,
Washington, D. C.:

We urge you to vote for the rivers and harbors appropriation in the interest of the Jamaica Bay development. The members of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce are solidly behind this project, and we urge you to give it your support.

ARTHUR S. SOMMERS, President.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I also present a letter from the chairman of the Port of New York Authority, which, I may say, was established by compact between the States of New York and New Jersey, and its membership is made up of citizens of both States. I ask that the letter may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

THE PORT OF NEW YORK AUTHORITY,
New York, February 5, 1923.

Hon. WM. M. CALDER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CALDER: The Port Authority has been somewhat concerned at the recommendations of the Director of the Budget for a cut of practically 50 per cent in the amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers for development and maintenance of rivers and harbors.

We are fully aware of the public demand and necessity for care and economy in Federal expenditures, but we believe it would be a false economy to cut those expenditures which are directly necessary in the provision for and promotion of productive enterprise.

We can, of course, only express a positive opinion about those items with which we are familiar, which are the ones relating to maintenance and construction of channels in the waters which constitute the port of New York district. We are familiar with the careful study and conservative judgment evidenced by the Board of Army Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in this district in arriving at their judgment as to the sums that could be profitably expended in this district during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924.

We not only heartily concur in those recommendations but we believe the expenditures essentially necessary in the interests of the commerce of the Nation being handled at and through this port and to the needs of the communities directly affected lying within the port district.

The expenditures recommended by the Chief of Engineers to be made in the port of New York will contribute both to productive enterprise and to economies in the handling of commerce to a degree far more than necessary to justify the expenditures as recommended.

Yours very truly,

E. H. OUTERBRIDGE, Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the Secretary state the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Idaho proposes to strike out "$56,589,910" and to insert in lieu thereof "$27,000,000." To that amendment the Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment to strike out "$27,000,000" and insert "$42,000,000."

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin shall prevail, would that defeat a vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then would recur upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McKELLAR. I inquire if the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have not been ordered upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as I understand, if the pending amendment—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was not aware that he had taken the floor. I merely wish to ask a question. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho prevails, I understand it will make the appropriation $42,000,000 instead of $27,000,000?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So that those who are in favor of the item should support the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for just a second?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] rather challenged the figures given by Mr. Newton, which I read, touching the reduction in freight rates from Minneapolis to St. Louis.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that I would just as lief yield the floor and resume it after he concludes. I did not expect to speak about what the Senator is discussing, but I can see that he ought to be permitted to say what he wants to say on that subject now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am sorry that I interrupted the Senator from Nebraska, but the Senator from Wisconsin wanted to know the authority for the statement as to the reduction of freight rates on lines paralleling the Mississippi River and the rates that prevailed from Minneapolis to Kansas City. At the time the inquiry was made I did not have the authority, but I wish to say that the information comes from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Since I have the floor I should like to call attention to a number of other discriminations, if I may be permitted to use that term, or, at any rate, instances showing that to points which have a river or sea connection freight rates are very much cheaper. I could take the rates from Portland, Me., to New Orleans, a distance of 1,686 miles, and show that the freight rate on first-class freight is $2.51, while from Dallas, Tex., to New Orleans, a distance of 515 miles, the rate is $3.315. The rate between Boston and San Francisco on fruits is just exactly the same as the rate upon the same class of freight between San Francisco and Kansas City, which is just half the distance. In other words, all the points that have water-competing rates have rail rates that are not exceeding half and in some cases are less than one-third of the rail rates between points equidistant but having no water rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the information just given by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is exceedingly enlightening. You will notice that he has given not what has been the rate, but the rate as it stands to-day. I should like to be sure of that, and I will inquire of the Senator from Arkansas: The rates that the Senator has just given are rates now in existence, are they?

Mr. CARAWAY. Rates now in existence or that were recently in existence.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The statement was made by somebody during the debate some time to-day or yesterday that while these things existed in the past they did not exist now. While I have not looked up any rate in reference to the debate on this bill at this time, I am satisfied that the discrimination that has frequently been pointed out, that has existed in the past, still exists. We have it with us now.

Mr. President, I do not believe that any man can justify the condition that the Senator from Arkansas has pointed out, for instance, in the rate from Portland, Me., to New Orleans, something over 1,800 miles, being much less than the freight rate on the same material from Dallas, Tex., to New Orleans. It seems to me that the discrepancy, the injustice, is so apparent that it can not be justified on any ground whatever.

I do not want to cast any vote or take any action here that would injure any legitimate harbor or river or other improvement that may be contemplated by this appropriation. Since I have been in Congress I have been one of those who have usually opposed the river and harbor bills. I think those of us who opposed those bills were doing what we thought was good service to the country and to the taxpayers who had to foot the bills. I never have believed that any river and harbor bill with which I have ever been familiar was all wrong. I never have examined one yet but that it had, in my judgment, a great many good items in it, a great many instances where the Government could properly expend the money that was provided for in the bill. But, Mr. President, it became common knowledge over this country—common belief, at least, on the part of practically all the people—that a river and harbor bill and a public buildings bill were two species of congressional legislation that could not be defended as a whole. They were designated—I think, as a rule, properly so—as logrolling propositions, containing a vast amount of appropriations for the expenditure of public funds that could not be defended upon any just and fair economical consideration.

I believe that the opposition that has taken place in the past to river and harbor bills, while it usually failed, and sometimes resulted in a compromise, has in the end done a great deal of good. As far as my limited time has permitted me to examine the particular uses to which this lump-sum appropriation is going to be put, I believe it is the best river and harbor appropriation that I have ever examined. It has a great many meritorious things in it. But, Mr. President, the reputation of a river and harbor bill has been built up by the kind of legislation that I have outlined; and the good and the bad have been classified, perhaps wrongfully, as a system of logrolling legislation that was unjustified, as a pork-barrel proposition. Like Old Dog Tray, who had to suffer because he was in bad company, those who have good items in the bill have to take the blame oftentimes because of the bad items that are likewise in the bill. I think there are some such items—as far as I have examined the bill, I think there are quite a good many such items—in this bill; that is, they are not in the bill proper, but they are included in the rivers and harbors that are going to be improved by the use of this lump-sum appropriation. They are included in the report of the engineers among the purposes for which this money is going to be used, and the use of a great deal of the money for these purposes can not be justified.

There is another reason now, Mr. President, why we ought to be more careful than in the past, and that is because of the necessity for economy in legislation. We have heard it preached by all political parties, by all people, by all newspapers, that the strictest kind of economy in appropriations was necessary now in this Government, as, indeed, it is necessary in every other government. We now have conditions confronting us that never have confronted us before when we were considering a river and harbor appropriation bill or a public buildings bill. We ought not only to scrutinize the bill so closely that we could throw out every proposition about which there was any doubt but we ought perhaps under existing conditions to delay a good many meritorious propositions that can be delayed without loss to the taxpayers.

Mr. President, in the report of the engineers printed in the Record yesterday, and printed in the Record at the request of a Senator who is in favor of appropriating $56,000,000 for this purpose, there are a great many items that require only a glance to tell that they ought to be excluded, at least at the present time, and some of them perhaps forever, certainly until the conditions show that there would be some reasonable excuse for the expenditure of public money upon them.

Here is one river that is to be improved where they expect to use $2,000 for maintenance out of this fund, and in the year 1921 the commerce on that river was 2,544 tons. In round numbers that is about $1 a ton out of the Public Treasury for maintenance alone. It is not contemplated in the case of that river to make anything new, but for every ton of freight shipped on the river it costs the Government of the United States practically $1 to keep the river in condition so that it can be shipped.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any knowledge of the influence of that particular river on freight rates in the surrounding country?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. GOODING. I want to say to the Senator that in my State the only chance for water transportation to the ocean which we had a few years ago was at Lewiston, Idaho. Because of the fact that there is possible water transportation there the people at Lewiston, Idaho, enjoy very much lower freight rates than the people at any other point in my State. Is it not possible, after all, that these projects that we are discussing here over which there is only a small amount of freight moving are of great benefit to the farmers of that particular community? It is true in my State, so far as the only river is concerned over which there is a possible chance for a boat to reach the ocean, although none is moving at the present time; but it is there.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, Mr. President; I will say, in answer to the Senator's question, that what he suggests is possible. Because it is possible, however, is that a sufficient reason for the appropriation of this money? Ought we not, before we use the money that is taken from an overburdened people by taxation, to require that a showing should be made, not that such a thing may be possible, but that there is some reason, some probability within reason, that if we expend the money we will get good returns from it?

Mr. GOODING and Mr. SPENCER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to both Senators. I yield to the Senator from Idaho first.

Mr. GOODING. I will ask the Senator if it is not possible also that there is a violation of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act, as amended, in those particular communities where but very little use is made of the river?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is possible, I will say to the Senator. All things are possible.

Mr. GOODING. That it has practically destroyed the water competition?

Mr. NORRIS. That may be possible.

Mr. GOODING. It is possible, and it is the fact in many communities.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say that that is possible; but before we take money out of the Federal Treasury it is not enough to show a possibility, in my judgment. Especially is that true now under existing conditions.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that more than a mere possibility ought to be shown. The necessity for the appropriation ought to be shown beyond a reasonable doubt; but I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he has considered the fact that out of more than 200 projects which the Engineer Department regarded as essential last year Congress picked out 36 as being strategic and necessary; and if this appropriation were reduced, as the Senator from Wisconsin proposes, to $42,000,000 not one dollar could be expended for any one of those 36 new projects? Those include Milwaukee, Galveston Harbor—where there is a real peril—Coos Bay in Oregon, and so on, the 36 strategic projects which need immediate attention. I say that for this reason, and I thank the Senator for his courtesy: The $56,000,000 is made up of the appropriation of last year, $42,000,000, plus $13,000,000, which is necessary for the new projects, and if it is cut down to $42,000,000 not one dollar can be expended upon the new projects.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does the Senator say that if this appropriation is cut down there will be nothing spent at Galveston, Tex.? What authority has he for that statement?

Mr. SPENCER. Because Galveston, Tex., is a new project.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not mean old Galveston; I mean the extension of the wall.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I mean.

Mr. SPENCER. It is a new project that was ratified by Congress last year—I have the act in my hand—and that is one of the new projects, for which $600,000 is appropriated. That is a part of the $13,000,000 that makes the difference between $42,000,000 and $56,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator aware that this very day in the Senate the Senator from Florida, in answer to interrogatories by me, read the testimony of General Taylor, in which he said that they would be able to take care of Galveston even though there was no increase above the Budget estimate?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, that is impossible—

Mr. NORRIS. That is in the testimony, from the man who has charge of all of it.

Mr. SPENCER. Because the Budget calls for $27,000,000, and the harbors upon the eastern seacoast and the western seacoast alone will require $27,000,000 for their maintenance. There would not be left in the Treasury a single dollar available for rivers. Here are the figures: $19,000,000 for new work and $7,000,000 for maintenance, which takes up the entire appropriation in harbors alone.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator was not here this afternoon when we went over that to the extent that we read the testimony taken before the committee, and that particular harbor was mentioned by General Taylor in his testimony, who said they were going to complete it anyway, even if they did not get any additional money.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have complete discretion, with the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course they have.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is nothing binding in this report at all.

Mr. NORRIS. To say that because we cut down the appropriation this particular place or that particular place will have to be cut out is to say that we will not be able to use any of the money appropriated. Nobody proposes to cut this appropriation below $27,000,000. It is true some places will have to be left out. Suppose they leave out a place like the river I have just read about, where it costs a dollar a ton for every ton that is moved over it to keep the river in shape so that traffic can be moved.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are many worse than that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, there are a number worse than that. Let neither the Senator from Missouri nor anybody else get the idea that I want to have the appropriation for those harbors or rivers or bays cut down, whatever they may be, which, in the judgment of the proper officials, should be cared for to the extent of the appropriation that is made. I do not want to have the appropriation entirely cut out. I believe that under existing conditions we ought to cut this down. I think we ought to cut it down to $27,000,000. There will then be some worthy places which ought to be worked on, where there must be delay. For instance, it developed this afternoon in the debate that General Taylor testified that if they got the $56,000,000 he expected to use seven or eight million on the Ohio River, and that with that money he expected to commence three new dams and work on them, as well as working on other dams which are partially completed. I would not want to prevent work on the dams which are partially completed. I do not want to prevent the building of those three new dams when we can do it properly and are in better financial shape to do it. I would not want to injure the existing conditions by stopping work on a dam, as the Ford followers did with the Muscle Shoals project, and to so fix an appropriation that it would not be usable during the season of the year when they could do good work. I do not want to injure the Government in that way. I would like to see the work on the Ohio River, where the Government has partially built a dam, go on at a reasonable rate, at a rate which would, under all the circumstances, be economical and proper; but with the present condition of the Treasury of the United States, with the present condition of the taxpayers of the United States, I would not start on any new projects. I would utilize the appropriation on the existing work, and we can do with less than $56,000,000.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator speaks of completing dams which have been started, but delaying the construction of new dams. It is true that work of that kind after it is started is very much more costly if the work is stopped, because floods and atmospheric conditions tend to disintegrate the work already done unless it is brought to completion as rapidly as possible.

Does the Senator realize the enormous economic waste, such as no private concern is guilty of, in constructing dams as we have constructed the dams on the Ohio River? There is a stream which carries more tonnage than enters New York Harbor. There is no harbor on this continent which handles as great a tonnage as is carried on the Ohio River. Coal has been transported on that river for five-tenths of a mill per ton-mile, and the average rate for like commodities on the railroads is 700 times that much.

Dams have been constructed over a stretch of 500 miles on the upper part of that rapidly falling stream where, in order to get a 10-foot pool, the dams had to be placed 6 or 8 or 10 miles apart. Now we have reached a stage of the river within 120 feet of sea level in an unbroken plane where one dam gives us a pool 30 miles long. Yet with the expenditure of all the millions we have spent the canalization of the Ohio River, with the prime purpose of giving us an unbroken waterway to the Mississippi River, is comparatively useless for through freight as long as there is one shoal, as long as there is one sand bar, as long as there is less than a 6-foot channel available. So the completion of two or three dams on the Ohio River not only makes available that portion of the river but opens to the commerce of the United States, through the industrial heart of this continent, the whole length of that great stream and multiplies by many hundred per cent the value of every dam hitherto constructed. Why this delay? Why this penny-wise and pound-foolish policy? Why this procrastination in an improvement of known value? Why continue this policy of holding a dime so close to your eye that you can not see the dollar, I can not understand.

Again I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska about the item he has just mentioned. What is the item which the Senator thinks is so objectionable?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not read any item that I thought was particularly objectionable, any more than 15 or 20 others I could have read.

Mr. STANLEY. An item where it costs a dollar a ton to transport the freight.

Mr. NORRIS. There are lots of them.

Mr. STANLEY. I wanted to get the one item.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator wanted to get the one I read?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes, for the purpose of illustrating a point.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator want the name of that stream?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether I can find it or not. I do not know whether I will get the same one.

Mr. STANLEY. Any one of them. One will do as well as another.

Mr. NORRIS. Take the Blackwater River, in Virginia, then.

Mr. STANLEY. What is the objection to that?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not made any. The Senator wanted me to give an item, so that he could argue.

Mr. STANLEY. I wanted to ask the Senator about some item to which he was objecting.

Mr. NORRIS. I will object to that one.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not at the present time. The Senator from Kentucky has not finished the question he was asking me.

Mr. STANLEY. This is my purpose, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska: I want to know the specific ground of his objection to some one of these items, so that I can get the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Which one?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not care which one he takes.

Mr. NORRIS. I gave my objection. The Senator does not want me to repeat it, does he?

Mr. STANLEY. If I understood the Senator, he said the amount of tonnage carried on the river previous to the improvement was so slight that the rate would amount to a dollar a ton on the traffic carried.

Mr. NORRIS. No. Improvement is not spoken of at all. I said that the cost of maintenance was practically a dollar a ton for the total amount of freight carried on the river.

Mr. STANLEY. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to this proposition, that if we take the freight carried prior to an improvement, it is totally misleading. I will give the Senator an illustration. There is no more pressing need now than to overcome, as far as possible, the seasonal lack of coal cars. Whenever the demand for coal in this country reaches its maximum—that has been the history for 10 years—there is a total failure on the part of the railroads in transporting the coal, and will be a total failure for many years to come. Since the last coal strike was settled we have had miners ready and willing to work and coal available to supply twice the amount needed by the people in the middle of this winter. The trouble is with the transportation. As soon as that demand is met, in a few months, you will find the tracks and sidings all over the United States littered with empty coal cars. We have more coal cars than we need when there is no great demand, during the period when there is slight demand, and not half as many as are necessary when the demand is abnormal.

There is a little stream which feeds the Ohio down near Shawnee Town. There is a proposition, for instance, to extend the canalization of that little stream up for about a mile or two. The record will show that practically no freight is carried on that stream at present. The dredging of that stream furnishes water transportation to the most remarkable coal field in that region. There are already thousands of tons of coal practically contracted on account of its by-product and gas qualities in St. Louis and other large markets. If those coal fields can be reached by water transportation, at the very time coal cars can not be obtained, there will be uninterrupted water transportation.

The quickest and surest way to solve this apparently unsolvable problem of a seasonal breakdown in transportation facilities is to reach the coal regions, wherever they are adjacent to navigable waters, by improving those streams. This slight improvement on the one stream that has practically no tonnage now would bring about a thousand times as much as is carried on the stream at the present time. We can not judge accurately by the meager data that we have as to the propriety or the wisdom of the improvements. None of them can be accomplished without the approval beforehand of competent Army engineers.

Mr. NORRIS. I have forgotten the question the Senator asked me, but I will proceed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Kentucky has well told what I think is necessary, and much better than I could have said it, but I would have said in substance a good deal of what he has said about the development of streams under the circumstances he outlined. If we can develop a stream that would reach the coal mine or a number of coal mines, I would be in favor of doing it; but when we did it, and the coal was developed and the Government had spent the money in improving the navigability of the stream so they could carry the coal out, does anyone suppose that the result would be that there would be any coal carried out? The case the Senator puts would be a proper one to develop. The stream he has described as running to the coal fields would be the kind of stream we ought to spend money on in making it navigable, but when we got it navigable the shipment of coal would commence and we would get some results from it and we would not be paying for the maintenance of the stream a dollar a ton for all the coal that was shipped out.

So that, with all due respect to the illustrious Senator from Kentucky, I do not believe that the river or the stream he has outlined, whether it be a real one or an imaginary one, has anything to do with the objection I am making to streams where those conditions do not exist.

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was just wondering if we could not get some kind of an agreement by which we could vote on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment and then take a recess until to-morrow. It is growing rather late. If we could agree to vote on the two amendments, I would like to see that arrangement made. I do not think the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has any objection to such an arrangement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not want to cut off any debate by making a motion to lay on the table, so I am waiting until the debate ceases. I want to test the sentiment of the Senate on the proposition. When no Senator desires to debate further, I intend to make a motion to table the amendment to the amendment and the amendment and find out how the Senate stands on the question. Of course, whenever the vote comes, it will determine that question; but I make this statement because I do not want to take the floor to make the motion for the purpose of cutting off debate.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to delay a vote. While I have held the floor a good while already, I have not had an opportunity to talk very much. It is often true in the Senate that the Senator who holds the floor does not do the talking. But that has not been my fault.

I was going to read, when the interruptions took place, several other items.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him briefly?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to make a brief statement as to the item to which he has called special attention. I simply want to describe it. It is an item having to do with a stretch of 13 miles of the Blackwater River from the little town of Franklin, a very enterprising town on that river. I think the improvement commenced in 1878. We have spent very little money on it.

Mr. NORRIS. In 1878?

Mr. SWANSON. I think we first had a small removal of obstructions there in 1878, but very little money has been spent on it. The traffic amounted to $303,000, though it was not large in tonnage. It consisted of peanuts and various products raised all along the river by the farmers. They would not otherwise have had access to the market. The commerce amounted to $300,000 that year. It is an enterprising town. In Franklin they have some railroad traffic, and I suspect most of it is picked up down the river. They have two steamers that have been regularly plying there for the last two years.

I am satisfied that there would be no development there in an agricultural way except for this small expenditure of money. The proposition is to expend $2,000 this year for the removal of some snags or obstructions that have come into the river. That is all that is needed to take it up and make it accessible to the two steamers.

I simply wanted to make this brief statement to show the amount of business that is possible as a result of the expenditure of that small amount of money, which is more than usually given to keep it up.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let us take the Senator's statement at 100 per cent. I have no doubt it is entitled to be taken that way. A small town commenced this development in 1878, and they have come up to 1921—just count the years—and it cost the taxpayers $2,000 a year to keep that stream open, and there was a little bit over 2,000 tons shipped out.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator let me correct a mistake? It has only cost since 1878 $22,000. That is the entire amount that has been expended on it in all those years.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not know that. I am glad to get that contribution. Out of the $56,000,000 that is proposed to be taken from the taxpayers of America, we are going to spend $2,000 to keep the stream open in order that this enterprising town may continue business.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to tell the Senator something else. All that has been spent on that entire enterprise since it started was $22,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what the Senator said, and I have accepted that statement. Out of the $56,000,000 to be appropriated when the bill passes and becomes a law the Government engineers propose to spend $2,000 to keep that stream open for one year. During the last year they have had just a little over 2,000 tons of freight. Should we appropriate from the Public Treasury of the United States funds for conditions of that kind? Are we warranted in doing it? If we are, then I want to call attention to an enterprising little town out in Nebraska—Stockville. It is the county seat of a county entirely agricultural, inhabited by some of the finest people in the world. It is on a stream. If Congress would spend $22,000 on that stream we could make it navigable for small boats to carry the produce of that community about 20 miles, where they would connect with a railroad. It would not cost $2,000 a year to keep the stream open, and I would guarantee that we would carry many times more than 2,000 tons of freight every year. Why not do that? If we do that in Virginia, why not do it in Nebraska?

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I would say let us do it; but if we are going to strike out all the projects that we now have in the bill there will not be any chance for the Senator to improve his river in Nebraska. Then, again, I want to call the attention of the Senator—

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer that first. That is a subject about which I want to talk a little.

If we strike this out, then there will not be any money to pay for making navigable, so to speak, the little streams in Nebraska. There, Mr. President, is the foundation of a log-rolling proposition. That is what has given to the river and harbor bills its bad reputation in the past and made good items suffer with the bad ones, because it is a proposition that "If you will scratch my back in Virginia, I will scratch your back in Nebraska. We will open up a stream and help an enterprising village in Virginia, and you will open up another one in Nebraska and help another enterprising village there." If it were carried on all over the country in respect to every enterprising village, the cost would be billions instead of millions of dollars.

Mr. GOODING. I would like to ask the Senator, if it is as good a thing as he says it is, ought it not to be done in the interest of the people and in the interest of the taxpayers?

Mr. NORRIS. Surely it ought to be done if somebody else will pay for it, but we are going to ruin the taxpayers before we bring it about if we have to pay it from taxation.

Mr. GOODING. I can not agree with the Senator. Will the Senator let me make myself clear on a question presented before? With the 12,000 violations of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act, there is no question of doubt that where there is any water transportation at all on all these projects the Interstate Commerce Commission has permitted violations of that fourth section. These small projects which carry only a few tons of commerce at the present time, if properly protected as they ought to be, might be carrying one hundred times as much more.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that statement.

Mr. GOODING. So it seems to me it is hardly fair to say what projects should be cut out by cutting down the appropriations. We should not be the judges, it seems to me. We can not judge fairly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator and I agree on the proposition. He takes what is possible and what I deem is possible. If in a given case it could be demonstrated that that was going to happen, I would be for it, but on the face of it that evidence is not produced. I say the burden of proof is on the men who get the appropriation. When they prove it, I will be for it, with limitations. I will be for it as far as I think we can go in the expenditure of public money without injury to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. GOODING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GOODING. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am sure there is no place in America where there is water transportation but what the railroads have practically destroyed it through violations of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act.

Mr. NORRIS. I again agree with the Senator in regard to violations of the fourth section of the interstate commerce act. I expect to discuss that before I close. I think there has been no excuse for it. There can be no reason given for it. It seems to me it has been unjustified, and I will go as far as any other Senator to stop it; but I am not willing, blindly and without evidence, to appropriate millions and millions of public funds to improve rivers and develop harbors until the evidence shows that there is some reasonable ground for believing that something would come from it. In one of the river and harbor measures that passed the Senate at one time there was a proposition to sink artesian wells in the bed of a stream in order to increase the flow so as to make it navigable. That actually happened in a river and harbor bill. I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, one can very easily reduce any argument to a reductio ad absurdum by simply quoting extreme things that have been said or proposed, but after he has done that it is nothing but a play of ingenious intellect.

Leaving the question of rivers and harbors just for a moment and going to the railroads, a cognate question because it deals with the proposition of transportation, how long does the Senator from Nebraska think the population of the United States would have had to wait in order to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific and the Mississippi and the Missouri with the Pacific if they had counted each mile of transportation or each 50 miles or each 100 miles to ascertain if it would give back to the Treasury of the United States the next year more than had gone out? We would still have been a little struggling country along the Atlantic and Mississippi, and the intermediate country where the Senator from Nebraska lives and where some few other Senators live would have been a wilderness. There must be addressed to every legislator a sense of reason concerning the potentialities of the development of a country. If we had built the transcontinental railroad lines simply upon the proposition that they would pay for themselves in the next year or the next 5 years or the next 10 years or the next 20 years we never would have built them at all, of course; and if we are going to wait to have the future prove about a few miles of river bed or a lake coast, that it is to be beyond all mathematical calculation potentially and commercially valuable, we would not improve either a river or anything else.

Mr. President, the entire development of the United States has come from the fact that we pushed westward, spending money like water for railroads and for water transportation in order to make a great nation of this country stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Amongst the people who opposed that movement in the very early days were a good many of my own ancestors, who did not think that we ought to do that, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. Later on I think everybody has concluded that we did very wisely when we laid down unprofitable lines of railroads between the Atlantic and Pacific—unprofitable then, unprofitable for 20 years afterwards, and some of them unprofitable in their main routes even yet.

The whole philosophy of the rivers and harbors bill consists in a great vision. Of course, upon every river and harbor bill there will appear an unworthy project here and there, because there will appear unworthy men here and there, who will father unworthy projects in order to be elected to the Senate or to the House of Representatives. So far as I can see that may not be very well prevented. The Senator is going off criticizing the sun, about the specks upon the sun. One can not criticize the sun in that way. Here is a great thing that has accrued to the enrichment of the United States, to its homogeneity of population, to its collectivism of government in very way, and has made a nation out of a straggling seacoast. We never have hesitated about spending a few dollars for that purpose, and there is no reason why we should do so. If anybody can point out to me 13 miles of river stretch the improvement of which will not pay for itself right now, but may in 20 years result in bringing to the people of the United States one hundred times the cost of the improvement, although we would have to wait 20 years for the money to come into the Treasury, I shall advocate it.

However, even there the Senator is not striking at the heart of the river and harbor bill, because the heart of it is in the ascertained streams whose ascertained commercial capacity everybody knows. The whole difficulty is that they have been stabbed under the fifth rib by enabling the railroads to make an unfair competition with them, and until we do away with that there can not be the full enrichment which the country should enjoy from its waterways.

A few minutes earlier in the day I attempted to illustrate that and to give the history of certain events which had occurred here in the United States; but the Senator's argument a few minutes prior to the time when I interrupted him amounted simply to saying that some things ought to be cast out of the bill because the number of dollars returned to the Treasury a year or two years or three years from now would not be equal to the number of dollars taken out of the Treasury in order to make the improvement. I deny that there is any common sense or any nationality or any long vision or any great business sense in that sort of argument. When a nation is betting it bets for the future; when the Senator or I, with our limited individual fortunes are betting, we had better go pretty close to the seashore and not bet much beyond what our bank account will permit us to draw on; but when a nation is betting upon the future there can be no "bears" on the United States; every wise man is a "bull."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I appreciate the question which the Senator from Mississippi has propounded by his short interruption. He has set up a man of straw, charging the straw man to me, alleging that I had made a certain argument, and then he says there is not any sense in it. That argument exists only in the Senator's imagination, for I made no such argument.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I listened to the Senator for some time, and I thought I understood his argument.

Mr. NORRIS. I am sorry the Senator did not listen to me more intently. I have been interrupted by other Senators. The Senator knew I had the floor and he probably listened to some other Senator who was speaking, and credited me with the argument which that Senator made. The Senator has not got what I stated right at all. I have not adduced or attempted to adduce the argument which the Senator pretends I have tried to adduce.

Mr. President, the Senator's argument, as well as the argument of several other Senators who have interrupted me, is to the effect that we ought to provide for everything at once because it would be better—for instance, as to the Ohio River—to complete all the improvements in one year; otherwise there the improvements which we make this year will not be fully realized on next year because another part of the river lower down is not developed to the same degree. That would be the model way to make river and harbor improvements; that would be the way to proceed if we had unlimited funds. I submit, Mr. President, that there is only one place in the United States, and that is in this Chamber, where a man will be ridiculed if he talks economy for the taxpayers of America; and yet out on the hustings, on every stump, and in the platform of every political party economy is the watchword; it is the demand made by the people; it is the promise made by the party and by the candidate for office.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question, and then I shall let the Senator from Nebraska alone.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in addition to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], with the supplemental amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I am informed that there are other amendments to be offered to this particular rivers and harbors title of the bill, and that it will be exceedingly difficult, and perhaps impossible, to finish the consideration of the bill tonight. It is now 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m., and one of the Senators has made a special request that I move an executive session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask unanimous consent—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to say a word before he makes the request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi if the discussion may not go on to-morrow? The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will have the floor in the morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wish to ask one question, because I probably will not be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has mismeasured my argument. I think if there is anybody who realizes the difference between an expenditure and an investment it is I. When I was speaking of river and harbor improvements in the way I did I was viewing them as investments. Very frequently a nation invests a large amount of money in order to receive an ultimate profit of very much more, expecting very little immediate return. I hope the Senator does not think that I do not know the difference between a mere expenditure and an investment. Most of the things where they are worth anything at all are investments and not merely expenditures.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, continuing what I was about to say, I ask unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow the Senate shall proceed to vote without further debate upon all amendments which may be pending to the rivers and harbors title of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that does not mean that we have got to vote upon the Lenroot amendment without an amendment to it?

Mr. NORRIS. There can not be an amendment offered to the so-called Lenroot amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it in the second degree?

Mr. NORRIS. It is already in the second degree.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well. But I wish to give notice now that while I am not going to object to the request for unanimous consent I want a direct vote upon the amendment proposing to make the appropriation $27,000,000, which, as I understand, is the so-called Borah amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. I want a direct vote upon that proposition; but if the Lenroot amendment shall prevail, we will not have an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Why could we not have a unanimous-consent agreement that we shall first vote on the proposal to make the amount $27,000,000 and then on an amendment proposing to make the appropriation $37,000,000 and last on the amendment proposing to make it $42,000,000 rather than to vote upon the larger amount first?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is wasting time in asking that that be done, because he will not get unanimous consent to do it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The yeas and nays have already been ordered on these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On both amendments the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator can bring up the question in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that; but the proper way to do is to vote on the smaller amount first, then on the next larger one, then on the third, and so on.

Mr. SWANSON. We are proceeding according to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that; but I think the proper way is to vote on the amendments in the manner in which I have suggested.

Mr. SWANSON. Then the rules of the Senate ought to be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock tomorrow the Senate without further debate shall vote upon all amendments which may then be pending to the rivers and harbors title of the pending bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Or amendments that may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Or amendments that may be offered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

The unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 8, 1923, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, on any amendment that may be offered, to the rivers and harbors title of the bill H. R. 13793.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he is willing to yield at this time in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. NORRIS. If it is the wish of the Senator from New York to take that course, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it the intention of the Senator from New York, after the executive session, to move that the Senate shall adjourn or that it shall take a recess?

Mr. WADSWORTH. An order has already been entered that the Senate shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that. I think we ought to have some opportunity to consider bills on the calendar. The time of the present Congress is getting short, and I think the calendar ought to be sounded for unobjected bills. I hope, therefore, the Senator from New York will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not the purpose of the Senator from New York to move to adjourn until the pending bill shall have been passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I hope that at an early date we may have an opportunity to consider bills on the calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 6 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 8, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty, we thank Thee that Thou dost show us from day to day the great and marvelous things. We pray for the forgiveness of our sins and for the redemption of our whole nature. Be Thou a defense to our peculiar weakness, and when temptation thickens around help us to recover our courage and faith. Work in us a sweet patience and a childlike trust in our Heavenly Father. Help us the solution of the difficult problems that perplex mind and heart. Cause the strong to come forth in defense of the weak, the poor, and the helpless, and bless our people everywhere with the bounties of Thy love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOINT SESSION OF SENATE AND HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 82.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 7th day of February, 1923, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The resolution was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege for the purpose of presenting a resolution which I think is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. HERRICK. Well, it is a matter in which I consider that the House—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his resolution. [After examining the resolution.] The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to have this read, so that the House can consider whether it is a question of privilege or not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on February the 6th, 1923, the Washington Times and the Washington Herald published a libelous, slanderous, and infamously false article to the effect that I, MANUEL HERRICK, a Member of Congress, had been sued for breach of promise by a Follies beauty, and had called himself a "Spark-plug lover," that a hated rival had broken up my romance, and that I had engaged a detective to spy upon an innocent girl, and other false and slanderous matter; and Whereas no Member of Congress is immune from equally vicious and libelous accusations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That any and all representatives of the Washington Times and Washington Herald be, and are hereby, expelled and debarred from the press gallery, the cloak rooms, corridors, and lobby of the House of Representatives during the remainder of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this resolution presents a question of privilege.

Mr. MONDELL. And as a motion it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman from Wyoming consent to some specific time—

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Agriculture.

"CROP FAILURE" DEFINED.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up S. 2023, defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 2023, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a yield of 5 bushels or less per acre of wheat, rye, or oats on lands owned by those in the drought-stricken regions who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, be, and the same is hereby declared to be a failure, and the borrower whose yield was 5 bushels or less per acre be, and he is hereby, released from repayment of the amount borrowed by him from the Government: Provided, That nothing herein shall release the borrower who signed a guaranty-fund agreement and whose crop was not a failure from making the contribution provided for in such agreement, but said guaranty fund shall be used as stipulated in the agreement to the settlement of the loans to those whose crop was a failure: Provided further, That any such borrower whose crop was a failure, as herein defined, and who made payment on his loan prior to May 31, 1920, shall be fully reimbursed from such guaranty fund.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] such time as he desires.

Mr. TINCHER. Ten minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas 10 minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I take the time of the committee only for the purpose of making clear what this resolution is about. I do not want the committee to confuse this resolution with the loans made to the farmers out of Government funds since the war.

During the fall of 1918 there was an effort made upon the part of the Government, through the several agencies then in existence because of the war, to procure increased production of grain, and a number of loans were made to farmers in an effort to get them to try to raise wheat in a territory where they had not previously found it profitable to plant wheat. These loans were not made as the loans recently authorized were made. They were made on a contract that called for as high as 100 per cent interest. The farmer who planted wheat in these arid regions was a patriot and doing it for his Government, and he did not object to a contract that called for the share that the Government contracts called for. These contracts called for a guaranty fund. Some men in my district paid as high as $2 a bushel interest on their wheat. I want to say that there is no question about this in my district, because there they made a wheat crop that year and the Government made money out of us. It is not a very long story. There were $276,000 paid in on this guaranty. Sixty-eight thousand dollars of that money was paid by men whose wheat did not amount to 5 bushels per acre when the contract provided that they should not pay anything for their wheat unless it exceeded that yield. The passage of this resolution, which passed the Senate by unanimous vote a year and a half ago, will simply mean that the Federal farm-loan banks will settle up with the Treasury in this way.

They should return the $68,000, the amount due on the crop failure. I am rather proud to handle this bill, because my district had a successful crop, and it was from my district that we paid in the guaranty money. But the fellow that failed to pay in the money is as much entitled to a return as the other. I refused to have it hooked up with bills looking toward excusing other debts due the Government.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Did I understand the gentleman to say that they paid as high as $2 a bushel?

Mr. TINCHER. They would take a bushel of wheat and agree to pay 25 per cent of the crop. It was just like you furnish the seed wheat and the fellow gives you half. That would not be considered as usury and it was not usury. We have a guaranteed fund of $268,000. Mr. Lobdell's letter is here in the report, and he wants to pay the money back. The whole contribution to the guaranty fund by those who had successful crops was $246,486. The amount of the loans paid by the borrowers amounted to $68,249, so that there will be in the guaranty fund $178,237 to be paid back into the Treasury.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it not a fact that many of the farmers who paid in this guaranty fund were in good circumstances?

Mr. TINCHER. Some of them were.

Mr. KINCHELOE. This is a bill to pay these fellows back that which they owed the Government—

Mr. TINCHER. They never contracted to do it. It was a mistake made in sending out the notices by the banks themselves. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], on this side of the House, was on the Agricultural Committee at the time the loan was made and was on the board at the time they had the transaction, and was very active in support of this bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. They borrowed the money from the Government to buy the seed wheat.

Mr. TINCHER. Yes; but this is not in the nature of forgiving a debt. I want you to discriminate between this bill and other bills that may come up in the future for forgiving debts.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Would not it be a good thing to have some limit of time in which these claims should be filed?

Mr. TINCHER. They are all filed and all audited. There was a serious question in the mind of the department whether they did not have the right to return the money, but they wanted to go along with the law. The exact amount that will be turned into the Treasury is in the report, and the Treasury will receive the money within a week after the President signs the bill, and they will mail the checks back.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And there will be no other claims?

Mr. TINCHER. There can not be. These men who produce the crop were all required to send the number of bushels that they raised, regardless of whether they raised 40 bushels or 100 bushels. They have a complete report.

Mr. LOWREY. If the bill passes, how does the Government come out on the whole deal?

Mr. TINCHER. The money was loaned out of a fund that the President had turned over to Mr. Hoover to go into the war with. I suppose the most of it was spent without any hope of getting it back, but in this particular transaction the Government will gain money, because they have a guaranty fund of $280,000 and there is only $68,000 that is going back to these people.

Mr. LOWREY. After these men are paid back there will be nothing to cover what the Government paid out.

Mr. PURNELL. If the gentleman will yield, I think I know what the gentleman from Mississippi has in mind. If the $68,000 is returned to the people there will still be left in the guaranty fund something like $178,000 to be covered into the Treasury. So it is not equivalent to an appropriation. I think this is a fair statement of the situation.

The appropriation act of 1920 released and absolved from further liability all of those who did not raise more than 5 bushels per acre. These producers who paid in this $68,000 were producers who did not raise the 5 bushels per acre, and if we do not correct this situation we are penalizing the men who are prompt; and, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] has very clearly stated, the officials of the Government are anxious to do this and want this authority from Congress.

Mr. TINCHER. There was no division among the officials. Take Mr. Lever, for instance. He was on the board at that time and he was entirely familiar with the creation of the fund and the loan. I do not care to take up any more time of the committee, unless some one desires to ask a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not this paternalism rather gone to seed? We first loan them the money to plant the wheat, and they plant it and pay the money back, and now we pay back the money that they pay to us.

Mr. TINCHER. I do not know whether my friend was in here when I started to speak.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been here all of the time.

Mr. TINCHER. This is not like any other loan that I know of. This is a loan that was not solicited. It was some money taken from the President's contingent fund to encourage crop production.

Mr. BLANTON. But if a man takes the money, whether he solicits it or not, and pays it back, he has only done his duty.

Mr. TINCHER. But the contract provides that he should not pay unless he raised 5 bushels per acre, and I think the law also provided that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Oh, the law did not provide any such thing.

Mr. TINCHER. It was paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. BLANTON. The contract was made regardless of the law.

Mr. TINCHER. The contract was made by the Federal officials that they would not collect unless there was 5 bushels per acre raised, and if there was more than that they would collect it up to 100 per cent. If a man raised 30 bushels per acre and he got only 1 bushel of seed wheat, he would have to pay for 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had concurred in the House amendments to bills of the following titles:

S. 4029. An act amendatory of and supplemental to an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Co. and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts supplemental thereto, approved, respectively, May 2, 1872, March 3, 1873, and June 22, 1874.

S. 4341. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Co. and its successors to construct a bridge across the Columbia River at or near the city of Hood River, Ore.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 543. An act for the relief of contributors of the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund.

The message also announced, pursuant to the provisions of Senate Concurrent Resolution 36, the Vice President had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. WARREN, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. ROBINSON as the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

House Concurrent Resolution 82.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 7th day of February, 1923, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make them.

"CROP FAILURE" DEFINED.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is one of the seed wheat propositions which always develop at the last into a gift. In 1918, under the revolving fund that the President then had, he loaned money with which to buy seed wheat. Of course that was right at the close of the war. There was no provision then defining a crop failure to be of 5 bushels per acre or less. They loaned the money to these wheat growers in the Northwest in 1918 with no stipulation at all except that they were to pay it back. In the agricultural appropriation act of 1920 there was a provision defining what was a crop failure, to wit, 5 bushels per acre or less, and it provided that those who raised 5 bushels per acre or less had a crop failure and would not have to pay.

Mr. TINCHER. I know the gentleman wants to be accurate.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Under the terms of the loan, in addition to giving a note to guarantee, the borrowers were required to enter into a guaranty fund agreement, and if the borrower realized 5 bushels or less he was obliged to pay his note, but he was entitled to be reimbursed, so far as the guaranty fund would go around. That is in the written agreement that was made between the banks and the men, and that is what I am talking about now.

Mr. KINCHELOE. There never was anything said in the law about what a crop failure was until the agricultural appropriation act of 1920 defined it. Then between 1918 and the adoption of the agricultural appropriation act of 1920 some farmers, I presume solvent farmers, may have raised less than 5 bushels to the acre, but they paid the money back to the Government according to their contract, which they had agreed to do, in a total amount of $68,000. To repeat, between 1918 and 1920, when this provision was inserted in the agricultural appropriation act defining what a crop failure was, there were farmers out there who paid to the Government what they owed to it, amounting to $68,000.

I presume they were solvent. They had the money. It is now a question of whether you are going to give back to the people who paid this under contract they had with the Government, this $68,000, whether you want to reimburse those farmers out there for that; and I want to serve notice on you now that you will have some more free-seed propositions here a little later that were contracted since the war, because the Agricultural Committee is constantly having people before it from the Northwest Territory wanting free seed wheat, wanting a guaranty for crops in a country where the climatic condition is such that it is not suitable to agriculture.

Mr. TINCHER. If this contract that was made during the war before the signing of the armistice provided that they would pay, some of them as high as 100 per cent, and that if a man raised less than 5 bushels per acre he should be reimbursed, and that guaranty fund was enough to pay him back, would the gentleman not be willing to pay that back, especially if the guaranty fund amounts to four times as much as that money?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Oh, they talk about a guaranty fund! They talked about that in another measure, but that fund belongs to the people and ought to go into the Treasury, and if we want to make a gift of $68,000 to solvent farmers who are benefited by the Government, who borrowed the money for seed wheat and paid it back, very well, but there will be some more free seed wheat propositions here from the Committee on Agriculture that were contracted since the war. If you want to do that, all right. It is a question for you to decide, but so far as I am concerned, I am against doing it. I want to assist the farmers of the country the country over, and expect to do so, but I think this $68,000 which these farmers owed should remain in the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be a growing function of the Congress first to lend the people's money out and when the money is to be paid back then relieve the debtor of paying the debt. We loaned this money to the wheat farmers to plant wheat. Some of them have paid back $68,000, and now there is an attempt to give them their money back. We loaned the foreign governments about $10,000,000,000. To one of the greatest foreign Governments, Great Britain, we loaned between four and five billion dollars under laws that they were to pay us the same rate of interest we had to pay for our money, which was over 4 per cent. Now the Congress is to assemble in a few minutes in joint session, the House and Senate, to receive a message from the Chief Executive of this Nation, not to have Great Britain pay back the money in accordance with the law under which it is loaned, but to pay back a lesser sum. In other words, to make a present of about 14 per cent interest on between four and five billion dollars to the great mighty nation that never yet has repudiated a single penny of debt, either principal or interest; a great mighty nation that can not afford to repudiate its debt; a great mighty nation which would not survive history if they repudiated the debt. Why, it is becoming a common practice. I am not in favor of paying this wheat money back. We loaned it. They raised a crop; they got the benefit of the money.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. They have now paid it back. Why prolong the discussion? It is just what I said to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas; it is paternalism gone to seed. I will yield now.

Mr. PURNELL. Is the gentleman familiar with the guaranty part of the agreement under which this money was loaned?

Mr. BLANTON. I am familiar with the law that existed in 1918.

Mr. PURNELL. I did not ask the gentleman that.

Mr. BLANTON. When part of this lump-sum appropriation was loaned to these farmers that provision was not in the law. I want to say to the distinguished gentleman that whenever public money is loaned out of the Public Treasury in this Nation it is loaned under act of Congress, under law, and therefore people borrowing must take notice of the provisions of the law. When they get beyond the law—

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman want the Government to profit under that bad guaranty, as he says, to the extent of $280,000 and now to the extent of taking $68,000 from men? Does the gentleman want to enforce one side of the agreement and not the other?

Mr. BLANTON. The Government is out right now several million dollars.

Mr. TINCHER. Not under this agreement and guaranty.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the whole seed agreements. The gentleman knows there has been about half the money paid back under all of these seed loans. About half has been paid back, and the taxpaying people of this country who put the money in the Treasury are the ones who have to stand the loss. Now, I will tell you they are getting tired of it. The time has got to come soon if we do not stop these propositions when we are going to have half the people in the United States maintaining the other half in idleness, and I am not in favor of it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some matters cleared up by the chairman of the committee. As I understand it, when the seed loans were made an additional charge was made from all those who got the seed in order to create a guaranty fund to relieve those from payment who received less than 5 bushels to the acre.

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. YOUNG. And some people who got less than 5 bushels per acre paid their notes under a misapprehension, not knowing that a guaranty fund had been created in the nature of insurance.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Practically they are in the same position as the man who pays for insurance?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. YOUNG. And if the Government refuses to come through it will stand in the same relation as an insurance company which refuses to pay after there has been a loss?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I may have your attention. This is not in the least complicated, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and my colleague on the committee [Mr. KINCHELOE] would have you believe. It is a very simple matter. In 1918 the Government adopted a seed-loan policy, the purpose of which was to loan money for the purchase of seed to two classes—first, those who had suffered drought during the preceding year, and, second, to those who were encouraged to raise wheat where theretofore wheat had not been grown. Every man who borrowed money, every producer, entered into a guaranty-fund agreement by the terms of which he agreed to pay a certain amount into a guaranty fund. Now, in case he suffered a loss—that is, raised less than 5 bushels per acre—he was to draw back from this guaranty fund paid in by those who were—

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Not now. Paid in by those who were successful. In case he suffered a loss he was to draw back from this guaranty fund which was paid in by those who were successful as much as that fund would stand up to the full amount of his loss. Now, a number of producers suffered distinct losses. They raised less than 5 bushels per acre, not enough to pay for threshing and raising. Men who, perhaps, were not familiar with the terms of the agreement they had signed came voluntarily and paid the full amount of their notes. The total amount paid in was $68,000. In 1920, after those men had paid in $68,000, this Congress, by the appropriation act of 1920, specifically absolved every man from further liability who had raised 5 bushels per acre.

The question then arose, Shall we penalize the men who paid in $68,000, who stood exactly in the same relation to the Government as those whom we absolved in 1920 by the appropriation act? That guaranty fund, which was paid in by the successful producers, created a sum of $246,486. That money was derived from payment by men who were successful, and the purpose of this resolution is to authorize the payment out of that fund of the $68,000 to those who suffered a loss. Answering the gentleman from Texas who raised the question awhile ago, this will leave in this fund a total of $178,237. Gentlemen, in simple justice to those who have paid and would be penalized if we did not pass this bill I hope it will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That a yield of 5 bushels or less per acre of wheat, rye, or oats on lands owned by those in the drought-stricken regions who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a failure, and the borrower whose yield was 5 bushels or less per acre be, and he is hereby, released from repayment of the amount borrowed by him from the Government: Provided, That nothing herein shall release the borrower who signed a guaranty-fund agreement and whose crop was not a failure from making the contribution provided for in such agreement, but said guaranty fund shall be used as stipulated in the agreement to the settlement of the loans to those whose crop was a failure: Provided further, That any such borrower whose crop was a failure, as herein defined, and who made payment on his loan prior to May 31, 1920, shall be fully reimbursed from such guaranty fund.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to be admitted that the dollars and cents involved in this proposition amount to $68,000. That is the money that is involved in a fund that grew out of this seed transaction. We have absolved those who did not pay in, but who made a crop failure. As I understand the bill, no one will benefit under it unless he made a failure in the crop, a failure in meeting the demand of the Government to try to increase the food supply of the Nation during the war. Every man who knows anything about wheat growing knows that 5 bushels or less to the acre was an absolute failure, that the farmer whose crop amounted to no more than that lost money. But it is said that he paid his honest debt and now he wants to have his money back. That was true of the men whom you absolved, except that they did not pay. Oh, gentlemen, $68,000 to men who made a failure in trying to increase the food supply of the Nation! You have paid prospective profits to some of these war contractors who tried to meet and were meeting the necessities of the Nation. Whether it be right or wrong, the stage is set to remit to England millions of dollars of interest that, as she made the contract, she would have to pay. Yet you quibble about remitting $68,000 of money paid by a few farmers in the Northwest who made a complete failure. I am not going to be in the attitude of having voted for some of the bills that have gone through here to clean up the accumulated losses of the war, and then say, "No, no; these fellows up there in the Northwest who have paid their money in ought to have kept it back, and I will not let them have it reimbursed to them out of the fund that they created." I am not going to be put in that little measly attitude, from my standpoint. It is not a question of technical liabilities. It is a question whether or not the Government will remit this amount to these unfortunate men who did the best they could to increase the food supply, and made a complete and miserable failure in their effort and lost money and tried to be honest with the Government, tried to meet their obligations which they were not bound to do by the technical provisions of the contract. They might have defeated the payment, but they did not do it. We have remitted the money to the others. Why not do it to those who were honest enough to come in and pay it into this fund. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this bill and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. WINGO. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KINCHELOE) there were—ayes 127, noes 14.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at 12 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

JOINT SESSION OF SENATE AND HOUSE.

At 12 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m. the members of the President's Cabinet entered the Chamber and took seats on the left of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the Acting President pro tempore of the Senate [Mr. MOSES] and the Members of the Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by their Acting President pro tempore and their Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The Acting President pro tempore of the Senate took the chair at the right of the Speaker and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following committee on the part of the House to wait upon the President and escort him to the Hall: Mr. MONDELL, Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. BURTON, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, and Mr. COLLIER.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate. On behalf of the Senate the Chair appoints as members of that committee the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW].

At 1 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m. the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House, was announced by the Doorkeeper, and stood at the Clerk's desk, amidst applause on the floor and in the galleries.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT. Members of the Congress, you have been asked to assemble in joint session in order that I may submit to you the report of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, covering its accepted proposal for the funding of the debt due to the United States from the Government of Great Britain. This report, concluded on February 3, 1923, reads as follows:

THE PRESIDENT:

The World War Foreign Debt Commission created under the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, having received the mission appointed by the British Government to consider the funding of the demand obligations of that Government held by the United States, reports as follows:

The British Government designated as its representatives the Right Honorable Stanley Baldwin, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Montagu Norman, the governor of the Bank of England, who have conferred with the commission in Washington and presented facts relating to the position of the British Government. The commission has also met frequently in separate sessions and has given the fullest consideration to the problems involved in the funding of the British debt to the United States. It became manifest at the outset that it would not be possible to effect an agreement for funding within the limits of the act approved February 9, 1922, and the commission has, therefore, considered the practicability of a settlement on some other basis, and though it has not been able, in the absence of authority under the law, to conclude negotiations, it unanimously recommends for submission to Congress a settlement with the British Government, as follows:

Principal of notes to be refunded	$4, 074, 818, 358. 44
Interest accrued and unpaid up to Dec. 15, 1922, at the rate of 4½ per cent	629, 836, 106. 99
	4, 704, 654, 465. 43
Deduct payments made Oct. 16, 1922, and Nov. 15, 1922, with interest at 4½ per cent thereon to Dec. 15, 1922	100, 526, 379. 69
	4, 604, 128, 085. 74
To be paid in cash	4, 128, 085. 74
Total principal of indebtedness as of Dec. 15, 1922, for which British Government bonds are to be issued to the United States Government at par	4, 600, 000, 000. 00

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods. The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000 and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000, the aggregate installments being equal to the total principal of the debt.

The British Government shall have the right to pay off additional amounts of the principal of the bonds on any interest date upon 90 days' previous notice.

Interest is to be payable upon the unpaid balances at the following rates, on December 15 and June 15 of each year: 3 per cent semiannually, June 15, 1923, to December 15, 1932, inclusive; 3½ per cent semiannually, June 15, 1933, until final payment.

For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest.

The commission believes that a settlement of the British debt to the United States on this basis is fair and just to both Governments, and that its prompt adoption will make a most important contribution to international stability. The extension of payment, both of the principal and interest, over a long period will make for stability in exchange and promotion of commerce between the two countries. The payment of principal has been established on a basis of positive installments of increasing volume, firmly establishing the principle of repayment of the entire capital sum. The payment of interest has been established at the approximately normal rates payable by strong governments over long terms of years.

It has not been the thought of the commission that it would be just to demand over a long period the high rate of interest naturally maintained during the war and reconstruction, and that such an attempt would defeat our efforts at settlement. Beyond this the commission has felt that the present difficulties of unemployment and high taxation in the United Kingdom should be met with suitable consideration during the early years, and therefore the commission considers it equitable and desirable that payments during the next few years should be made on such basis and with such flexibility as will encourage economic recuperation not only in the countries immediately concerned but throughout the world.

This settlement between the British Government and the United States has the utmost significance. It is a business settlement fully preserving the integrity of the obligations, and it represents the first great step in the readjustment of the intergovernmental obligations growing out of the war.

Respectfully submitted,

A. W. MELLON, Chairman.
CHARLES E. HUGHES.
HERBERT HOOVER.
REED SMOOT.
THEODORE E. BURTON.

In its comments upon the arrangements negotiated the commission itself has said essentially everything necessary to commend the agreement to your sanction. Note that the commission urges that the settlement is on a basis which "is fair and just to both Governments," and "will make a most important contribution to international stability." More important still is the closing observation that "it is a business settlement, fully preserving the integrity of the obligations, and it represents the first great step in the readjustment of the intergovernmental obligations growing out of the war." In these observations I most heartily approve.

The call of the world to-day is for integrity of agreements, the sanctity of covenants, the validity of contracts. Here is the first clearing of the war-clouded skies in a debt-burdened world, and the sincere commitment of one great nation to validate its financial pledges and discharge its obligations in the highest sense of financial honor.

There is no purpose to report that your commission has driven a hard bargain with Great Britain, or to do a less seemly thing in proclaiming a rare generosity in settlement. Amid widespread clamor for the cancellation of World War debts, as a fancied but fallacious contribution toward peace—a clamor not limited to the lands of debtor nations but insistent among many of our own people—the British commission came to make acknowledgment of the debt, to put fresh stamp of approval upon its validity, and agree upon terms for its repayment.

It was manifest from the beginning that Great Britain could not undertake any program of payment which would conform to the limitations of time and interest rates which the commission had been authorized to grant. But here was a great nation acknowledging its obligations and seeking terms in which it might repay. So your commission proceeded to negotiate in a business way for a fair and just settlement. Such a settlement had to take into consideration the approximately normal interest rates payable, as the commission suggests, "by strong governments over a long term of years," with a temporary interest rate and suitable options adjusted to the tremendous problems of readjustment and recuperation. Your commission went so far as it believed the American sense of fair play would justify. Even then the British debt commission did not feel justified by its instructions to accept the proposal. Only after submission to the British Cabinet was the proposal of your commission accepted, and I bring it to you, with the earnest recommendation that it be given, so far as legislative procedure will admit, a cordial and prompt approval. [Applause.]

A transaction of such vast importance naturally has attracted widespread attention and much of commendation. It is a very gratifying thing to note the press and public have uttered substantially unanimous approval. [Applause.] It means vastly more than the mere funding and the ultimate discharge of the largest international loan ever contracted. It is a recommitment of the English-speaking world to the validity of contract; it is in effect a plight against war and war expenditures and a rigid adherence to that production and retrenchment which enhances stability precisely as it discharges obligations.

It can not be unseemly to say it, and it is too important to be omitted, the failure of the British undertaking would have spread political and economic discouragement throughout the world and general repudiation would have likely followed in its wake. But here is kept faith—willingly kept, let it be recorded—and a covenant of peace no less effective than it would be if joint British and American opposition to war were expressly agreed upon. It is a covenant of peace and recuperation, of respect and cooperation. It is a new element of financial and economic stabilization, when the world is sadly needing a reminder of the ways of peace. It is an example of encouragement and inspiration, when the world is staggering in discouragement and bowed with the sorrows of wars that were and fears of wars which humanity is praying may be avoided.

Ordinarily I should be reluctant to add this question to a congressional program which is already crowded, in view of the short period remaining of your session. But it is of such outstanding importance to us and to the world that I should be remiss if I did not invite your sanction even amid crowded calendars and pending problems of great importance. And I hope you will be glad to approve. If the debtor nation could decide to assume the great obligation in two cabinet sessions, in the face of enormous financial and economic difficulties, surely the deciding authority of the creditor nation will be ready to approve in a spirit appropriate to the great transaction and with a promptness which will convey befitting appreciation.

I am not unmindful of the disposition to pledge the application of anticipated payments in giving sanction to the settlement. It is not necessary to remind the Congress that the use of moneys secured in the repayment of war loans has been pledged by the very grant of authority to make the loans. The repeal of that commitment is always within the authority of the Congress if such a repeal is deemed wise, but it will best comport with the importance of such an international transaction to give a frank, exclusive, and direct decision, uninvolved by any disposition of the moneys which the funding program ultimately will bring to the Federal Treasury.

Nor am I unmindful of the importance of pending legislation with which any prolonged consideration of the debt settlement might come in conflict.

Knowing there is abundant time for ample debate, I would be recreant to my belief in the urgency of a decision on the merchant marine bill if I did not renew the request that it be brought to a final disposition. [Applause.] I venture the allusion because it has been threatened that the merchant marine act shall not be allowed to come to a vote. To-day you have a debt settlement which is to bring the Treasury something more than a hundred and fifty millions a year, and we rightly appraise it a notable accomplishment. On the other hand, the executive branch of the Government is charged with the operation of Government-owned shipping, which is losing the Federal Treasury $50,000,000 a year. It is as important to avoid losses as it is to secure funds on debts or from taxation sources.

I have detailed the discouraging situation with our shipping to Congress, and have suggested what is believed to be a remedy, not only to put an end to the losses but to uphold an American merchant marine to meet our cherished aspirations and further our commerce abroad. In inviting your support I frankly urged that if Congress would not approve that it should submit some alternative remedy. I am unwilling, the public is unwilling, to continue these appalling losses to the Public Treasury, when we know we are operating with no prospect of relief or of ultimate achievement. Congress owes to itself, to the executive branch of the Government, and to the American public some decisive action. Mere avoidance by prolonged debate is a mark of impotence on a vitally important public question. [Prolonged applause.] I plead for a decision. If there is a favorable majority, the bill should be enacted. If a majority is opposed, defeat will be decisive. Then if Congress fails in providing the requested alternative measure, the executive branch of the Government may proceed as best it can to end the losses in liquidation and humiliation.

I speak frankly, because the situation demands frankness. I am trying to emphasize a responsibility which can not be met by one branch of the Government alone. There is call for congressional expression, not mere avoidance. I am not seeking now to influence the Senate's decision, but I am appealing for some decision. [Prolonged applause.]

There is time, abundant time, for decisive action on both these tremendously important questions. I have brought up the shipping bill because I can foresee the possible conflict for right of way, but it ought and can be avoided. There is time for essential debate of both, and each carries its own appeal. Either is fit to be recorded a chapter in great achievement, both will mark a signal triumph. Both are inseparably related to our good fortunes at home and our high place in the world. [Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the President and the members of the Cabinet retired from the Hall of the House.

Whereupon the Acting President pro tempore and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

The SPEAKER. The joint session of the two Houses is now adjourned.

At 1 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m. the House resumed its session.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATORS, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 10819, relating to the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10819) relating to the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

PRINTING THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS (H. DOC. NO. 554).

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, was any disposition made of the President's address?

The SPEAKER. Not yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that it would be desirable to have it published in document form? I assume it is going to be put in document form. I think it would be desirable to have it in document form as quickly as possible, so that Members may have the opportunity of studying it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the President's address be published as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the President's address be published as a House document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SCIENTIFIC INVESTIGATORS, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10819, relating to the Department of Agriculture, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10819, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the maximum salaries per annum of the following number of scientific investigators or employees engaged in scientific work, paid from the general appropriations of the Department of Agriculture, shall not exceed as follows:

Not more than seven in excess of $4,500 but not in excess of $5,000 each;

Not more than five in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each;

Not more than three in excess of $5,500 but not in excess of $6,000 each, and in no case shall the salary of any exceed $6,000.

SEC. 2. That the salaries per annum of the following officers in the Department of Agriculture shall not exceed as follows:

Director of scientific work, $6,000; chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, $6,000; chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, $6,000; chief of the Bureau of Forestry, $6,000; chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, $6,000; chief of the Bureau of Markets, $6,000; chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, $4,500; chief of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements, $4,000; librarian, $2,500.

SEC. 3. That upon the written approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, and then only in the case of extraordinary emergency, not to exceed 10 per cent of any amounts appropriated by Congress in the annual appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office in the Department of Agriculture shall be available, interchangeably, for expenditure on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, or office: Provided, That there shall not be added to any one item of appropriation more than 10 per cent of such item.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the bill makes provision for maximum salaries of scientific investigators in the Department of Agriculture. It is proposed to increase the salaries of a number of scientific investigators whose salaries are at present limited to $4,500 by the provisions of the act of June 30, 1914. They are as follows:

Not more than seven in excess of $4,500, but not in excess of $5,000 each;

Not more than five in excess of $5,000, but not in excess of $5,500 each; and

Not more than three in excess of $5,500, but not in excess of $6,000 each.

On yesterday the Committee on Agriculture had the matter under consideration, and decided to increase the number of increases, and when the bill comes up for discussion under the five-minute rule amendments will be offered to increase a number of salaries. If no time is desired in the discussion of the bill generally, it may be discussed in debate under the five-minute rule. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to state that in substance this bill enacts into law the detailed increases of salaries that were made the other day by the Committee on Appropriations in the Agricultural appropriation bill. In other words, this is to make permanent law the increases carried in the appropriation bill the other day. It was the unanimous report of the Committee on Agriculture, favored by every member, unquestionably a strong indorsement, and in my opinion is urgently necessary to be acted upon now.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is not the day of retrenchment in the expenditure of public funds. I do not know where it is going to end. There is hardly a day or a week passes but what we have a similar bill for increased salaries under consideration. Yesterday we had a bill before the House increasing the salaries of our consular agents $528,000 a year above the present statutory salaries, and an extra increase of other expenses of the Government in the creation of a retirement provision involving $500,000 a year more. In addition to that, we increased the amount allowed for subsistence amounting to quite a large sum; in other words, instead of $5 a day for subsistence, in addition to traveling expenses, the bill increased it to $8 a day. As I say, I do not know where it is going to end. I am afraid that the day is going to come when the farmers on the farms and the cattlemen are going to be furnishing the money for the support of the balance of all the people of America. Those people will all be either on the retired list or drawing public salaries from the Treasury.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Did not the gentleman vote the other day for an increase of salaries in the appropriation bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I did not; I opposed it.

Mr. ASWELL. Why did not the gentleman have a record vote and oppose it?

Mr. BLANTON. The RECORD will show you how I opposed it. I did oppose it with all the vigor in my being.

Mr. ASWELL. It did not seem to have much effect on the House.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it never does when the distinguished governor of Louisiana is here.

Mr. ASWELL. He is not here.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the ex-governor, then.

Mr. ASWELL. He is not here.

Mr. BLANTON. The ex-lieutenant governor.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman shows that he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I want to answer the gentleman's question first. What good does it do to have a roll call, and what good does it do to ask for a quorum unless it forces a record vote? We can not force a record vote in the Committee of the Whole and there was no way to do it in the House on that raise. It punishes men who are somewhere else, and accomplishes nothing, unless you can force a record vote. I have tried that before. I had roll calls time and again during the Sixty-fifth Congress when there would be only 30 or 40 men on the floor, and I tried it in the Sixty-sixth Congress, but it only made every man in Congress mad at me. I had them feeling like the ex-governor of Louisiana feels when I oppose his propositions.

A MEMBER. The next governor.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the future governor—I knew there was a governorship attached to it somewhere.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman still shows that he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure there is a difference of opinion existing between the gentleman from Louisiana and the present governor—one thinks one way and the other the other. But I am not responsible for that. I am fighting against this everlasting and eternal increase of salaries here in the bills on the floor of the House. If I could get some help from the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, I might stop it.

Now, let us see about these salaries. We are going to raise by statute here, in the aftermath of the war, when the days of reconstruction are upon us, when we are supposed to be getting back to normal to such an extent that we can remit and annul war-time contracts; we are proposing to pay scientific men who have served during the war without asking for more salary—we are proposing to pay them increased salaries.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to get some of these facts stated, and then I am going to yield in a minute.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not making a misstatement; I want to treat the gentleman courteously and I am going to do it. But I am going to do it in my own way and I am not going to let the gentleman from Louisiana do it his way.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman has not stated the record correctly—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be abrupt with the gentleman from Louisiana. I am trying to treat him courteously. I am trying to keep my temper and smile, and I am doing it. But here is what the bill says about some of these salaries we are increasing: "Not more than five in excess of $5,000." They are not getting that now. I think their present statutory salary is $3,500, and if I understand the proposition this is an increase of $1,500 a year. "Not more than five shall be paid in excess of $5,500." That is a substantial increase of their salary of about $1,500 over the statutory salary. "Not more than three in excess of $6,000 each." This is permanent law. "Director of scientific work, $6,000."

We provide in this bill that the director of scientific work shall get $6,000 a year, that the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry shall get $6,000 a year, that the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry shall get $6,000 a year, that the Chief of the Bureau of Forestry shall get $6,000 a year, that the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry shall get $6,000 a year, and the Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey $4,500 a year, and so on.

I want to show you now what the governors of the various States are getting—distinguished men, competent men, intelligent men.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment.

Mr. DICKINSON. No; now.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not yield now; I shall yield in a moment. The Governor of Alabama gets $5,000 a year, the Governor of Delaware, the State of my distinguished friend, Doctor LAYTON, gets $4,000 a year, the Governor of Maryland, the great State of my Baltimore friend who rides the great white charger, $4,500 a year.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment.

Mr. DICKINSON. But that is a very long moment.

Mr. BLANTON. The Governor of New Hampshire gets $3,000 a year, the Governor of Oklahoma gets $4,500 a year, the Governor of South Dakota gets $3,000, the Governor of Tennessee—and Tennessee has had some of the greatest men in this Nation as its governors—gets $4,000 a year, the Governor of Texas gets $4,000 a year, the Governor of Vermont $3,000 a year, the Governor of Wyoming $4,000 a year. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it not true that men accept the governorships of the various States for the honor there is in it, while these men who are experts are accepting these positions as their life work, and they never expect to get anything more? There is absolutely no analogy in the gentleman's argument at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me tell the gentleman something. There is just as much honor connected with the duties of the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, if he does his work patriotically and well, as there is connected with the governorship of a State.

Mr. DICKINSON. Did the gentleman ever know of a man being recognized politically by the people generally because he happened to be the chief of one of these bureaus down here in Washington?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is it not also true that he does not get "honorable" on his tombstone? [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is more a question of the amount of money that he happens to leave when he dies.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it not also true that the experts are in demand in competition with the chiefs of these departments, and they can go out into the various walks of life with corporations and other organizations at much larger salaries, while there is no competition so far as governorships are concerned, because a whole lot of fellows would take that job for nothing?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman propose to pay public salaries by the Government in competition with private employment?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not; but I hope to pay sufficient salaries so that we can keep some of these men in the department and not have them all go out.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman hopes to pay in comparison with private establishments, he will bankrupt this Nation.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I promised first to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman made a statement that these men whose salaries are increased worked during the war time at their present salaries. That is not true. The places are vacant. The department could not get anybody to fill them.

Mr. BLANTON. Vacant?

Mr. ASWELL. They are vacant now, because we can not get competent men to fill them.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the office of the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry vacant? No. Is the office of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry vacant? No.

Mr. ASWELL. But the gentleman has not read the bill very carefully. There are five places provided for in this bill at $6,500 a year, and they are now vacant because men are not available at the present salary of $4,500 per year. And why? Because these same scientific men in the gentleman's own State and other States receive salaries at an average of $7,500 a year, and the University of Ohio pays $15,000 a year for the same work that these men are doing at $4,500 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman says that these places are vacant.

Mr. ASWELL. I said that some of them are vacant. I did not say they were all vacant, and the gentleman knows that I made no such statement as that.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I yielded to the gentleman for a courteous question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. Here is the director of scientific work, $6,000. Is that place vacant?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a new place.

Mr. TINCHER. They have had an appropriation for it for over a year and have been unable to fill it.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a new place, and we never heard of it until the last year or so.

Mr. TINCHER. They have had an appropriation for it for more than a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but it is something that the Government has gotten along without until 1922.

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman not believe in having some new developments here?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we are having them all of the time in the way of new places and new salaries. That is an evolution that we ought to stop. Let us get down a little further. There is the Bureau of Animal Industry. That office is occupied by the same man who has filled it for a long time. He is just having his salary raised. Here is the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and that office is still occupied by Doctor Taylor, the same man who has been in charge for a long time. He has been there ever since I have been in Congress. That office is not vacant.

Mr. HAUGEN. Doctor Taylor has been with the Government for about 30 years.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Iowa also has been with the Government and his State probably for 30 years.

Mr. HAUGEN. That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; it has. It is the same identical question. It involves the same principle.

It involves somewhat the economic policy of the Government. What has it done for you—anything?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am satisfied. But does not the gentleman think that anyone who has rendered excellent service for years and years is entitled to some consideration and some increase in salary? I think the service rendered by these gentlemen is recognized by everybody, and they are recognized as some of the most eminent men of this country.

Mr. BLANTON. I am a peculiar individual. I can differ with a man as totally as a man can differ, and yet not fall out with him. I give my friend here the right to his opinion, and I recognize he has the right of opinion. I give every man of this House the right of their opinion, and I have the right to mine, and I do not fall out about it.

The distinguished gentleman from Iowa can go back to his State and tell his farmers out there about raising all these salaries and may get their approval. I do not object to it if he can get it. Why, I just say I do not believe in it and the people whom I have the honor to represent do not believe in it. The people in the State I come from do not believe in it, and I do not believe the people of this Nation believe in it, and I will tell you why.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to yield to both in a minute. Here is what I want to say: This raising of salaries has been going on for years and years. I am going to show how I know the people of the United States do not believe in it. It has been going on for years and years, this raise of salaries, and I just want to mention one little thing, and I can mention it as a Democrat, for if I mentioned to you something about Republicans you would say I am a partisan. I am a partisan Democrat, but I can mention something about a Democrat without being partisan. We had a very distinguished gentleman from Kentucky in the House, a splendid gentleman, one of the ablest men in the United States. He wanted to stay on in the House at $7,500. He ran for Congress in his State for reelection. He was defeated. He would have been perfectly willing to have stayed here and continued his labors for $7,500 a year, but after he was defeated, what did Democrats do? Democrats put him in the office of the Railroad Board at $25,000 a year. The people of the United States have been watching these things. They do not like it. And though we were then in control in this House, in the succeeding election they gave you Republicans a majority of 170 Members in this House. Then you Republicans kept it up and you went a little further than we did. You began making these new positions and increasing these salaries, and the reading and thinking people of the United States were watching the proceedings here and in the last election they wiped out your 170 majority and reduced it down to about 20 in the next House.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the gentleman is to be congratulated because he is carrying out his persistent opposition to subsidies. But these other gentlemen in the House who are opposed to a ship subsidy are willing to carry on and pay for subsidies at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. I am against all subsidies.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman want to be classed with gentlemen who class the salaries of scientists in the Agricultural Department as a subsidy?

Mr. BLANTON. No; not if it is a reasonable salary.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman believe—

Mr. BLANTON. But when you have a prominent educator, who teaches science in a university, not drawing over $5,000 a year in the universities of the different States—when you have a teacher of science drawing only $5,000 a year and satisfied with that chair and not giving it up to receive other compensation—when you raise the scientists down here in the Department of Agriculture $1,000 above university scientists and to a point where it is not a legitimate salary in reconstruction times, it is a subsidy.

Mr. TINCHER. If the salaries in the universities have become such that they can not compete and keep men in their scientific departments, would it not be necessary for them to come up to those salaries?

Mr. BLANTON. I guarantee you will have plenty of able scientists in the Agricultural Department under the present régime, under the present system, under the present law without increasing a single salary.

Mr. TINCHER. There are some places that have not been filled at these higher salaries; more than half were not filled last year.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. How does the gentleman account for it?

Mr. BLANTON. We have vacancies in Congress.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Taylor, the gentleman mentioned awhile ago, and I think he deserves some personal mention, I happen to know has been offered within the last four years at different times more than twice the salary at which he has been working for the Government to go into a private institution.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did he not do it?

Mr. TINCHER. Because he loves the work and loves his country, and for that reason he should have a reasonable salary. Would the gentleman deny a man that because he feels that way? It is a question of paying that or abandoning the work.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to tell the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] that I went to Texas last summer, and I went out through the farms, and I saw good women and little girls on riding plows out in the hot sun plowing the fields from early in the morning until late at night. I saw them out in the harvest fields. I saw them at hard work. Do you know what they receive at the end of the year? All the way from $600, for the whole family, on up to about $1,200, for a whole family; and sometimes they have a total crop failure.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. The people the gentleman refers to are the very ones we are trying to help.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, you are not going to help them in this way.

Mr. HAUGEN. The department is endeavoring to improve farm conditions, and in that way to help them.

Mr. BLANTON. It is about $33,000,000 that we spend in this Agricultural appropriation bill each year, is it not?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I tell you what I believe: I believe that the farmers and the agricultural interests of this Nation get the benefit of about $3,000,000 of that, and the other $30,000,000 is overhead. That is just my honest belief as to that proposition. I have reached that conclusion since I have been in Congress.

Mr. HAUGEN. You had reference to the annual appropriation. That does not include the permanent appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the annual appropriation. I honestly believe that the real agriculturists of the Nation get about $3,000,000 of actual benefit from that bill, and the other $30,000,000 is wasted in administrative expenses.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If that is a fact, does the gentleman say that by reason of that he is in favor of destroying the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; I am not in favor of destroying the department, but I am trying to keep this money from being spent for overhead salaries, and I am trying to divert it into the proper channel, so that the real benefit will go to the people on the farms.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman knows that I have been just as much against the salary increases as anybody, and I voted against the appropriation in the Agricultural appropriation bill the other day mainly because it was legislation on an appropriation bill, to which I am opposed. But the Secretary of Agriculture came before us yesterday and testified that five of these scientific places are vacant now. He thought he had a contract to close all those five places, but he said when those fellows realized that it is still temporary law they would not take it. That is what the Secretary of Agriculture said about it. And he further says, what is true, that the Agricultural Department pay roll is less than that of any other department of the Government. If that is true, then as a friend of the agricultural interests in this country I am not going to stand in the way of that. I will take the word of the Secretary of Agriculture and vote for this bill, because I am not going to help to hamstring the activities of the department by voting against this proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Kentucky is one of the strong men of this House. His judgment is good on most questions, on most issues, and on most bills; likewise the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], and likewise the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. I follow them here lots of times on propositions. But I want to tell you where you can not always follow them.

The Committee on Naval Affairs has the Secretary of the Navy and the big admirals come down before it at hearings and convince its members that they must increase the naval personnel, that they must increase the number of battleships, that they must increase the number of cruisers, that they must increase the number of submarine chasers, and administrative expenses. They say we must do this and that, and they have the most convincing way you ever heard of of convincing the committee that they are right; and they do convince the committee, and the committee in bringing in their bill bring in provisions granting most of what the Secretary of the Navy wants. It is the same way with respect to the War Department.

We passed a law here right after the war limiting the number of men that Secretary Baker could enlist in the Army under the appropriation we gave him. Secretary Baker went right ahead and violated our instructions. He went beyond the law. He disobeyed it, and he enlisted more men than we authorized, and I heard Republican after Republican get up on this floor and skin him alive because he did it. Then your party came into power.

Mr. DICKINSON. Did he deserve it?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and I helped to do it. Then your party came into power, and your Secretary of War did the same thing. You provided for almost as large a number of men as Secretary Baker enlisted, and the very men who did the skinning of Secretary Baker turned around and provided for practically the same men that he had enlisted. So with the Department of Agriculture. When the distinguished Secretary comes up from the Department of Agriculture he brings all of this able scientific chiefs with him, and then he actually stampedes our economy friends on the committee. He convinces them that the Department of Agriculture will go to the demnation bowwows unless we increase the salaries. They make the committee think that our country is going to lose our Agricultural Department if they do not increase the salaries, and they are carried away with the argument, and they bring in their bill with all the increases that are asked. And just so it is with all of our legislative committees.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I assure the gentleman that the Secretary of Agriculture has no hypnotic power over me; but I was wondering whether the officials in the Agricultural Department had any more hypnotic influence over members of the Committee on Agriculture than the newspapers and the elite and the bon tons of Washington have over the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the gentleman from Texas is a member.

Mr. BLANTON. Have they exercised any hypnotic influence over the Member who is now occupying the floor?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I think they have, to the extent that the gentleman is now espousing suffrage in the District of Columbia. I think somebody has exercised some hypnotic powers over the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I believe that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] is different from the make-up of most of the Members of the House if he would deny to 437,000 people living in this District the right to representation on the floor in the way of a Delegate.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not think I will ever vote for suffrage in the District of Columbia, but I certainly will never do it so long as my taxpayers in the State of Kentucky and taxpayers from every other State are paying 40 cents of every dollar that is spent for the support of the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. When I suggested that I was in favor of giving a Delegate to the District, and was in favor of the people of the District electing their commissioners, and was in favor of letting the people of the District elect their school board, the papers ran me in headlines and said that the Blanton bill was a fine proposition; but when they got hold of the Blanton bill and read it, they saw in it a little clause which said that hereafter every school building erected in the city of Washington was to be paid for wholly out of the District revenues; that the people of Kentucky and Louisiana and Texas were not to be taxed any more on that account. Then they read a little further in that bill and found out that BLANTON'S bill provided that all of the expense of furnishing books to 66,000 school children here, and the expense of hiring 2,500 teachers to teach them, and the expense of these elections should be borne wholly by the people of the District of Columbia, and then the newspapers dropped the Blanton bill like a hot rock.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield on that?

Mr. BLANTON. They had nothing more to say about the Blanton bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] has not read up on what the Blanton bill contains.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was wondering why the gentleman did not apply the same principle to all taxes for the support of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman remembers my speeches on the subject or will read my bill he will find that it covers most of the millions of dollars which are now poured out of the Treasury from taxes paid by the people of Kentucky and Louisiana and Texas and other States to pay the expenses of the District and seeks to stop it all.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman was amending it by sections. I was wondering why he was not going to do the whole thing all at once instead of amending by particular sections.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to deny representation in this House by a Delegate to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am talking about taxation. The gentleman said he proposed that the people of the District of Columbia should pay for their own schools, and I agree with him. I was wondering why he did not apply the same rule to all the expenses of the District.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will read my bill he will find that it covers practically all of it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman did not say that.

Mr. BLANTON. It covers practically all of it. But why should not these 437,000 people have a Delegate on this floor to speak for them? Why should they not have a Delegate before the District Committee to speak for them when the committee has hearings on matters relating to the District? Why should they not have a Delegate to get up here when every District day is promised and then turned down? Why should they not have a Delegate to get up here on the floor and speak for them? I am in favor of giving them representation to the extent of a Delegate. I think that is as little as we ought to do.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The point I am making is that somebody evidently had some hypnotic influence on the Committee on the District of Columbia, and especially on the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Do not you ever be a bit afraid that they can Coue me. I am one Member that they will never Coue.

Mr. KINCHELOE. They may not be able to do that, and I want to say also that neither the Secretary of Agriculture nor anybody else has any hypnotic influence over me.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think they have, but they have enough on somebody to get these salaries increased.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I should like to go back to what the gentleman said about the Navy.

Mr. BLANTON. That was a mere incidental illustration.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman said that the Secretary of the Navy and the admirals appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs and made them believe anything they wanted.

Mr. BLANTON. No; but that they got what they wanted.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Navy and the admirals appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs and asked certain things, but that they did not convince the Committee on Naval Affairs, but later did convince the House?

Mr. BLANTON. They convinced the ruling power that gave them what they wanted. They finally got what they wanted.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman will admit that they did not convince the Naval Affairs Committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Not the chairman who brought in the bill; but, nevertheless, they got what they wanted through some other members of the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. WOODRUFF. But they did not get it from the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Not through the action of the committee, but they got it from the House through some members of the Naval Affairs Committee. It makes no difference how they got it; they did get it.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman referred to the War Department.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going back to that.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman made a statement. Let us see whether he is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Go ahead.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman said the War Department came down here and persuaded us to authorize more men for the Army than ever Secretary Baker had enlisted. Secretary Baker enlisted 240,000 men. He got the number up to 240,000, and we cut it to 175,000 within 30 days after we came into power, and we never authorized anything like 240,000, and the gentleman ought to know it.

Mr. BLANTON. How many is the gentleman in favor of himself?

Mr. HULL. I am in favor of the present number of 128,000, and I am in favor of cutting that if necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did the gentleman let them put it at 175,000, 50,000 above what he believes necessary?

Mr. HULL. Simply because—

Mr. BLANTON. Because they overawed you.

Mr. HULL. The Secretary of War had recommended 240,000 men.

Mr. BLANTON. And he violated the law when he did it.

Mr. HULL. And we reduced it to 175,000, then we reduced it to 150,000, and then we reduced it to 125,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do you not come along down the line and reduce it to 100,000?

Mr. HULL. I am calling attention to the fact that the gentleman made a misstatement.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman has corrected it, and he has admitted that they put 50,000 over on him more than he wanted.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. When do we resume the question of salaries?

Mr. BLANTON. Whenever gentlemen get through asking foolish questions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield? I do not know whether this is a foolish question or not, but I want to ask the gentleman this question: The gentleman from Texas paid a high tribute to the gentleman from Iowa, to the gentleman from Louisiana, to the gentleman from Kentucky, and stated that usually their judgment was sound on administrative questions. Does not the gentleman think that there is a probability that their judgment is right in this instance, and that the gentleman from Texas may be wrong?

Mr. BLANTON. It might be. My people in Texas may be wrong as to what they want. The farmers back in Alabama are pretty much like the farmers in Texas. In fact, some Alabama men went to Texas, but they are about like the gentleman from Alabama. I went home and I asked the farmers in my district what they thought about these things. I got their view. I am representing them and I am supposed to do all I can to please them. Do you know that the farmers back in Alabama and the farmers in Texas who live on rural free delivery routes and read the papers every day keep up with what is going on here and know more about the bills that are introduced in Congress than we do? You can go back home and the farmers will ask you questions about bills that you do not know a thing on earth about. That is why some Members do not want to go home—they can not answer their questions. They know too much. If there is anything on God's earth that the 314,000 people of my district are determined upon it is to cut down taxation and the expenses of the Government. Now, the one way to stop it is to stop spending.

When an individual's income does not amount to as much as his expenses why what does he do? Why he cuts down his expense in order to keep out of bankruptcy. When the income of the Government is not sufficient to meet the expenses of the Government and they have no new means of taxation, what should a sane government do? It ought to cut down its expenses. The only way to cut down expenses is to quit passing increased salary bills that come up here every day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand the issue here, I may be misinformed, it is not a matter of increase of salaries but only a matter of paying the same salaries that they are now paying. Am I not correct?

Mr. BLANTON. It is making permanent law out of what they did this year, which in some instances was granting $1,500 raise in the salaries of several men. That is what we did in the appropriation bill, and this bill is to make it permanent law, so that it will have to be done every year.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the discussion by the gentleman from Texas. I was interested in that feature of his address in which he complains that too much of the agricultural appropriation is spent for overhead and too little of it goes directly to the people. There is some ground for that complaint, and to that extent I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Texas, although I do not agree with him that this is an improper increase.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that some few weeks ago when the Agricultural appropriation bill was being considered there was an earnest effort made to provide $360,000 that would go directly to the people to provide for the distribution of garden seeds to the people of the country such as the gentleman described with tears in his voice and who were found digging in the garden and plowing in the fields, working in the mills and making gardens at home, and who to-day are writing 25 letters a day to me asking for seeds, and many deploring the fact that there will be none for the next year. When that auspicious occasion came, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] offered an amendment appropriating $360,000 to go directly to the people, the distinguished gentleman from Texas made a point of order against it, which was sustained by the Speaker, and the people at home lost it.

I just want to direct the gentleman's attention to that, and the attention of the House, and again register my protest against this shutting off of the people from some direct participation in some of the appropriations that are made by this Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the House of Representatives by their vote sustained the action of the Speaker.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and the House of Representatives by their vote sustained the action of the Speaker, and sustained the charge that this gentleman from Texas makes, not to have too much of this going to the people, because the gentleman from Texas voted in that way.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the gentleman is in error when he says that the House approved the substance of the proposition. I know that I am in favor of the seed proposition, yet I voted to sustain the Chair because I thought he was right upon the question of the point of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am speaking of the result and answering what the gentleman from Texas says.

Mr. SEARS. I received a letter yesterday from a very eminent gentleman, a scientist, and he said that he was sorry to see the garden seeds cut off, and that about all that he could do now was to pay his income tax.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not running with the scientists. I am running with the folks that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says he is standing for—the people who work, the people who come to us and ask for a little something free—but whenever there is a proposition here to cut them off from direct participation in some of the money we spend, I am not like some of the gentlemen in this House, who talk for them and then vote against them on a proposition of that kind. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this bill may or may not be in the interest of the farmers. I have noticed lately that almost every bill that is brought before the House which will increase expenditures is urged for the reason that it will benefit the farmer. One of the most insistent reasons that has been offered for the adoption of the ship subsidy bill is that agriculture requires it, and yesterday we had before the House a bill to increase the salaries of our diplomatic and consular officers, and one of the strong arguments made in favor of the bill was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] to the effect that it would benefit the farmer to increase the salaries of diplomatic and consular officers. So the argument urged in favor of this pending bill is certainly not novel. I do not assail or criticize the work of these scientific investigators, or the heads of these bureaus such as the Bureau of Plant Industry, the Bureau of Animal Industry, the Bureau of Chemistry, and other important bureaus in the Department of Agriculture. I am sure they are doing a valuable work. These gentlemen may be worth all the bill proposes to pay, but the reason that I am opposed to its enactment at the present time is because the House has already passed a reclassification bill which undertakes to do equal justice to all of the Government employees, from the man who receives $720 a year up to the man who receives the higher salaries in the Government service. The House has shown its good faith to these employees by the adoption of that measure. The Senate has not adopted it. If, for reasons of economy, it would be unwise to enact that general legislation at this time, then I can not see my way clear to vote for legislation which will discriminate in favor of this limited number and who seem to be reasonably well paid.

What kind of a situation will we have if this bill is passed?

Let us take the Post Office Department, for example. I used to be a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and have some little knowledge about the workings of that department. The First Assistant Postmaster General, for example, has supervision over 75,000 or 80,000 postal employees. He has supervision over 53,000 post offices and postmasters in the United States, and yet he receives only $5,000 a year. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has supervision over 43,000 rural routes, 43,000 rural carriers, all of the vast rural free-delivery mileage in the United States, and yet he receives only $5,000 a year.

The Second Assistant Postmaster General has supervision over about 20,000 railway mail clerks. He has supervision over the entire transportation of the mails of the United States, and yet he gets only $5,000 a year. The three Civil Service Commissioners who have supervision over the examination and selection of the eligibles of the entire civil-service personnel of the United States receive only $5,000 a year. I submit that if the situation is such as to require us to pass a bill to give the chiefs of the bureaus in the Department of Agriculture $6,000 per year, it ought to be such as to cause us to pass a law which will give the officials I have mentioned and others equally worthy similar increases in salary. Therefore, it brings us right back to the general proposition that if we are going to deal with these particular employees, we ought to deal with them all in one bill, as we did in the reclassification bill, and do justice to all of them. Take Mr. Ethelbert Stewart, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. I dare say there is not a more competent man in the United States for his particular kind of work than Mr. Stewart, and he gets only $5,000 a year.

He is just as much a scientist in his field of labor; he is just as valuable to the Government of the United States as anyone of the chiefs of bureau of the Department of Agriculture, valuable though they may be. [Applause.] Now, if for considerations of economy we are forbidden at this time to enact general legislation, then the same considerations should move us to vote against this bill. I agree that economy is an important consideration. Our backs are already bending under the burden of taxes that we now have. Oh, yes; gentlemen say, "This will not cost much." Yesterday the Committee on Foreign Affairs said, "This will not cost but $700,000 or $800,000, will not add but a little more to the burden of the taxpayer, and therefore pass it." These gentlemen bring in this bill to-day and say, "This will only add a small amount."

Mr. HUDSPETH. How much?

Mr. BLACK. The figures, I believe, have not been stated, but I admit it will not be a very large amount; but until we do balance our budget it is a good time to practice economy. Now, the President when he vetoed the bonus bill in October gave as one very good reason for that veto that there was probably a deficit of $700,000,000 in the present fiscal year. Now, later on, when he made his speech to the Congress in December, I believe he said the estimated deficit would be about $273,000,000; and recently a statement was given out still reducing the estimated deficit, but as my colleague from Texas [Mr. GARNER] pointed out a few days ago, this change in the amount of deficit is not due to economy practiced by this Government; it is due to the sale of capital assets of the Government and the use of them in the payment of current expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield me one additional minute?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield the gentleman one minute additional.

Mr. BLACK. Just in order to finish this statement. What is the sale of capital assets? Why, we have in the Treasury, or did have, about $183,000,000 of farm-loan bonds. We had in the hands of the Railroad Administration several hundred million dollars of railroad securities. We had in the hands of the Navy Department several hundred million dollars of surplus supplies purchased during the war. We had in the hands of the War Department, and still have, a large amount of surplus material. Now, what has taken place?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In a moment. The Secretary of the Treasury is selling these farm-loan bonds; the Railroad Administration is selling these railroad securities; the War Department is selling these war supplies; and the Navy Department is selling its surplus materials and the proceeds from these capital assets, which were bought with bonds, are used to pay current expenses of the Federal Government. I do not complain that these capital assets are sold but I do say we have not balanced our budget, and we ought to do it before we continue to increase the expenditures of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be an occasion on which statesmen indulge in economic and political soliloquies with reference to salaries, seeds, and so forth, so I think that a modest retiring Member, who seldom intrudes himself upon the patience of the House, may proceed to indulge in the same pastime for five minutes. I have no desire or intention to discuss the pending measure, because I know very little about it. As a general proposition I believe in paying everybody a proper wage or salary for the services they render. Neither shall I criticize any of those gentlemen who seem to be so much disturbed because they lost their seed. That naturally would disturb some gentlemen. [Laughter.] But I observe the growing tendency of this House, and I do not criticize it, but it is a tendency, to express a concern in the welfare of the American farmer. I say I do not criticize the growing tendency. I am glad to see it. I am not interested so much in getting a package of seed to the farmer or town man. I am not so much interested in some of the other things that are done for the farmer or in his name, or are done to him, as I am, as those know with whom I have served, deeply and seriously.

concerned in the general proposition of the general welfare of the American farmer that is wrapped up in better credit and marketing facilities. The American farmer is not going to be satisfied with giving him a county agent. He is not going to be satisfied with giving a few seeds. He is intelligent enough to know that his trouble can not be relieved by little palliatives like that. He knows that his troubles are fundamental. I am firmly convinced that if the war had not interrupted the program of those who were responsible for that character of legislation under the last administration that we would have completed that program and have written upon the statute books a bona fide, practical rural-credit system.

I regret that there is no effort by the administration being put forth at this time along that line. There is an effort which, I fear, is largely political, to put through a so-called program, where most of the benefits seem calculated to go to a man who has a big farm already or else he has sufficient wealth to enable him with five others to get together and put up a capital stock of a quarter of a million dollars or a million dollars, as provided in one of the bills. I do not object to extending the benefits of the farm-loan system to all the farmers, but I say that instead of trying to reach the men higher up and more prosperous, I wish there was a bona fide, sincere effort on the part of those who are responsible to try to reach further down and provide some agency by which the landless man can have an opportunity upon terms that he can bear and under which he can work out and under which he can get a home, because I am convinced that the farm home owners constitute the surest and safest bulwark and security for our free institutions.

I am interested in quicker facilities and less red tape in supplying the small farmer, who already has a farm and wants a small loan of less than $10,000. I say I am deeply interested in that. I am interested in trying to cut out the awful waste that there is in the distribution of farm products, by which the American farmer and the American ultimate consumer have to pay an awful toll to the men who stand in between and take toll for their services. They may render services for which they should be paid; I am not discussing that. I am discussing the practicability of eliminating some of this machinery that stands between the producer and the ultimate consumer.

Those two problems, Mr. Chairman, are more important than the question of raising the salaries of a few scientists in the Department of Agriculture or the distribution of seeds under congressional franks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think that in the administration of the Federal reserve act men should get away from that fear that they continually express that whenever you undertake to handle the credit of the American farmer you are getting into an unsafe field; because I believe, in my humble judgment, from my study of the question, that there is no safer or sounder credit for either the mercantile banker or merchant or anybody else who deals with them than the credits that are bottomed upon the products that come from the farmers' toil, and I believe half of that problem would be solved if you could just get that fear out of the minds of the men who control these credit agencies. I wish you could realize that if a credit is frozen, when it is extended to a farmer to hold his wheat or his cotton on his farm, by the same line of reasoning and the same line of logic it is a frozen credit if extended to the cotton factor and the wheat elevator man to hold that cotton or that wheat in their hands. There can be no distinction. I recognize the argument with reference to frozen credits; but, Mr. Speaker, it is like the argument with reference to inflation. There is a clear distinction between that which is liquid and that which is frozen, just as there is a proper distinction between legitimate and wholesome expansion and dangerous inflation. That, I contend, Mr. Chairman, is the wrong viewpoint, and it is the failure to make a correct distinction that produces the fear I refer to.

The newspapers told us yesterday afternoon that the Senate had passed the "buck" to the House on these farm bills. I am not going to say anything in violation of the rules, but from my knowledge of the situation I am inclined to believe that they have thrown into the hopper bills that many of them do not understand. They call one of these bills the "Capper bill." In my judgment it ought to be called the "Eugene Meyer bill." They say, "Oh, what is the difference? It does not make any difference in what form it is, it will not do much anyway; it can be whipped into shape; just bring it on." That is a dangerous way of preparing legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] offered some criticism because I made the point of order against the Langley proposition to continue spending $360,000 for garden seeds. There was just as much overhead in that proposition as there is in the balance of these appropriations. When you compute the cost of printing all of the congressional seed franks and the cost of having them addressed and sending them to the seed division down in the Department of Agriculture, and having these seeds bought and put in bags and placed in packages, and having the two separate packages in which they are inclosed printed at the Government Printing Office, the expense of doling them out and the expense to the Government in our Post Office Department in connection with scattering them all over the United States, you will find there is a big overhead in that, and it ought to stop.

I saw in the newspapers that our distinguished colleague from Oklahoma, the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON], had been able to so accumulate seeds that she sent a whole carload out from Washington down to Oklahoma to her district. Of course that is overhead. There never has been, in my judgment, a single package of free garden seed yet delivered to one of our constituents that has paid in benefits the cost of it; not one.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CURRY. I would like to know if the gentleman is aware of the fact that the lady from Oklahoma sent all of her seeds to schools in her district? In my judgment, if there is any proper way to send out garden seeds, that is the way to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is not any good way to send them out. It is true that there are some valuable seeds that are still provided for in the bill, valuable seeds of kinds that the farmer can not get in his neighborhood. They will continue to go out. They do bestow great benefit on the farmers when they receive seed like alfalfa and milo maize and soudan grass and kaffir corn. Things of that kind help the farmers, who are benefited by them. They use them, but take these little quart packages of cotton seed that the distinguished gentleman and myself send to a few of our cotton-planting farmers, what can they do with a quart of cotton seed? They are not going to plant that seed and keep it separate and have the cotton ginned separately. The sending out of such seed as that has been a waste of the money of the Government, and the farmers have not appreciated it and they want it stopped.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman stated in his former address that if over $3,000,000 of the annual agricultural appropriation went direct to the farmer he did not know about it. Now, we appropriate over $4,000,000 for county agents who go out into every county. Does not the gentleman believe that is a good thing?

Mr. BLANTON. I believe the average farmer in Iowa or Texas knows more in five minutes about practical farming than half of these county agents that are appointed and sent out. Many are appointed through political patronage.

Mr. DICKINSON. Would the gentleman want to strike out that appropriation?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because some of them are good, but some of them are not good. Some of them are not worth a penny to the farmer. I believe it is a good policy to keep them if we can get good men, but I am against the patronage part of it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is not that true of the men who come to Congress, that we ought to get good men?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no requests for further time and I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the maximum salaries per annum of the following number of scientific investigators or employees engaged in scientific work, paid from the general appropriations of the Department of Agriculture, shall not exceed as follows:

Not more than seven in excess of $4,500 but not in excess of $5,000 each;

Not more than five in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each;

Not more than three in excess of $5,500 but not in excess of $6,000 each, and in no case shall the salary of any exceed $6,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 1, strike out the matter in lines 3 to 13, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the maximum salary per annum of any scientific investigator or employee engaged in scientific work and paid from the general appropriations of the Department of Agriculture shall not exceed $6,500: Provided, That no salary shall be paid under this section at a rate per annum in excess of $5,000 except the following: Not more than 12 in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each, and not more than 5 in excess of $5,500 each."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman make some explanation of this amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, this increases the number to receive in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 from 5 to 12, and the number who are to receive in excess of $5,500 but not in excess of $6,500 from 3 to 5.

The numbers indicated in the amendment are identically the same as those carried in the appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1924.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman tell us why that is necessary?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the amount carried in the appropriation bill and agreed to by Congress, and if my memory serves me right it was adopted by the House by unanimous vote, I believe without a dissenting vote. It is the number suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture, and it is believed that this should be done.

Mr. BLACK. I notice that the gentleman also raises the limit $500.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. What is the reason for that?

Mr. HAUGEN. The reason for that is that we believe the amount should be increased. I think all of us appreciate the worth of the Department of Agriculture and the value of the service rendered by the very efficient employees in the department.

Mr. BLACK. Most of us think we are pretty generous when we go to the limit proposed in the bill, but the gentleman proposes this increase right out of hand.

Mr. HAUGEN. It increases the maximum salary from $4,500 to $5,000. The facts are these: In that great department, with upward of 20,000 employees, only 19 employees receive a salary of $5,000 or above while the outside Government service has 7,724 receiving the $5,000 or above. A year ago of the 19 in the Department of Agriculture receiving $5,000 or above only 3 received a salary above $5,000.

Mr. KINCHELOE. This does not increase the limit beyond that which was contained in the agricultural bill as we passed it. That was $6,500.

Mr. HAUGEN. It does not increase the limit beyond that in the agricultural bill.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; but it does under this bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. It increases the maximum to scientists from $4,500 to $5,000, with the exception of those provided for here at a higher salary.

Mr. BLACK. And it increases the limit that may be paid to $6,500.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; for 12 of them not to exceed $5,500, and for 5 of them not to exceed $6,500.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment when the time comes, to strike out "$6,500" and insert "$8,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield the floor?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out "$6,500" and insert "$8,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON to the amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Strike out the figures "$6,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want just one minute to say this: That the committee met with such a warm reception when they brought in their bill for increase to $6,000 that where we gave them an inch they are now taking an ell in this amendment. They see that it is an opportune time now to increase the amount to $6,500. If the other gentlemen on the floor want to do that, they will do it without my vote.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think we all appreciate that the cost of living has increased and that salaries and wages have increased all along the line, and it is now time that recognition should be given to these worthy and deserving employees of this department. It is the judgment of the committee and the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture that the maximum salaries should be fixed as provided in the proposed amendment for employees.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the proposed amendment will it be permissible for five to receive the maximum salary of $6,500?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any question but that he will exercise his discretion and pay the highest amount?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not unless it is necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has there been any instance when it comes to the increasing of a salary that it has not been to the maximum amount? Can the gentleman mention one instance where there is an exception?

Mr. ASWELL. Let me say that the salary has been $6,500 per year and it has not been paid to anyone.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The maximum has been $6,500, and the Secretary has not paid anybody $6,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many in the present year is the Secretary privileged to pay $6,500?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Five.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we always repeat ourselves. I want to call attention of the committee to what it means to fight these little appropriations. In this last year the Department of Agriculture has had in that department to contend with the fights made on the packer control law, the grain futures act, and numerous other important propositions to the agricultural interests where they have been contested in the courts by the department against the greatest financial organizations in this country. On one side over there to-day are the representatives of the Department of Agriculture contesting five big packers who propose to merge. They are meeting the best paid talent in the world, they are meeting the best paid lawyers and the best scientists that money can hire. Yet every time we come upon the floor of this House and recommend that the Secretary of Agriculture be unfettered and have a reasonable amount of money to spend in the conduct of his business there are men on the floor who pretend that they represent some farmers down home; that they want to call out to the country to look upon their barefooted farmers following a double-shovel plow in Texas, who get up and protest against treating the Department of Agriculture as we treat other departments of this Government. Whoever heard of the Representatives of the farmers protesting against the Secretary of War in peace time receiving $12,000 a year for his services? But you let the Committee on Agriculture come in here with a unanimous report, regardless of party—and there are men of both parties on that committee—and they get up and howl about increased salaries. The Committee on Agriculture works every day in the year, and I venture the assertion that the men on that committee, regardless of party, are better informed as to what transpires in that committee than in any other committee in Congress.

Here is a unanimous report, and the amendment offered is the unanimous vote of the committee. Here are men who say they are friendly to the farmers who want to hamper the department, so that when Mr. Armour, of Chicago, tells the department what to do and sends a half a million dollars' worth lawyer here to try some case the department will have to go in with a two dollar and a half man. Yet the men there now are 100 per cent, except their salaries. I said the other day that I favored giving Henry Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, $50,000,000 in a lump sum to battle for the farmers, and to place no strings on it. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to say that I am in accord with what the gentleman has said, but I do not think he ought to let the charge stand in the Record that a Texas farmer uses a double-shovel plow.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, they said that the farmers down there were barefooted, and I thought, perhaps, they used the double-shovel plow. But the Texas farmer is all right, and if he understood the situation and understood the fight that these men who represent the department are having to make I think he, regardless of party, would support this measure.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL], who was on his feet.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in this very important matter I think we should have a quorum. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan and Mr. BLACK.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported that there were 6 ayes and 96 noes.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan is lost; a quorum is present, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] will proceed.

Mr. HILL. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. HILL. All I wanted to say was that I remember that in the antitrust cases the Government had against them $50,000 lawyers for a particular case, and the Government lawyers were only paid about $5,000 a year. I think the gentleman has put his finger on a very important question.

Mr. BLANTON. And in that case what was the gentleman from Maryland paid?

Mr. HILL. I was a $4,000-a-year lawyer.

Mr. TINCHER. Right now the solicitor of the department is trying a case in the Supreme Court of the United States involving millions, and the Grain Exchange has the very best talent in the country, the very best lawyers, and does not spare any expense to win their case. Now, here is what I wonder at: Every time this committee comes in upon the floor of the House, no matter how unanimous their report may be on the particular bill, certain gentlemen who pretend to be the friends of the farmer take the floor and call us wasteful, extravagant, no-account Congressmen, and they will have the people believe they are the only friend of the people. I think an amendment like the amendment just proposed should be voted down; I do not think it ought to have the support of two men in this House, and I do not believe it will have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make of gentlemen who contest and challenge every increase of salary that is proposed. I think such increases of salary ought to be contested and challenged because a showing should be made that will justify them, and unless that showing is made, then the increases ought not to be granted. I am as anxious as any man in this House to keep down expenditures to the lowest possible point, but we must always remember that above everything else, we must keep the efficiency of the Government service up to the highest standard possible. [Applause.] Gentlemen talk as if it were an argument against an increase at the present time, because we have been making increases in the limitation from time to time. It is true that we have made increases from time to time. However, I want this committee to understand that the Agricultural Department is the only department of the Government that has to submit to these limitations such as are included in these various acts which fixed the limitations. Why are not limitations placed in the acts referring to other departments of the Government? In the Agricultural Department where there is more need for scientific men requiring a higher grade of salaries than in any other department of the Government, why should there always be these limitations? I call attention to what has been the record in respect to increases from time to time, and I do this in justification and not in refutation of the practice. The first limitation upon the salaries that was made for scientific investigation in the Department of Agriculture was placed in the agricultural act for the fiscal year 1906. The limitation in that year was fixed at $3,000. In 1908 it was raised to $3,500 and in 1911 it was changed to $4,000. In 1915 it was changed to $4,500, and in 1923 it was fixed in the appropriation bill at $6,500. The bill under consideration seeks to make permanent law out of the provision in the agricultural appropriation bill, and we hope it will stay for a long period of time. Why were these increases made? The answer is evident, and the reason is more potent now than it ever was before. In this remarkable industrial Nation of ours, there has been a continual demand for scientific experts who will bring to our industrial improvement the highest type of intellectual ability, the highest grade of educated efficiency. Competition for these men have made these increases necessary from time to time, and in order to keep up with the competition the Government has been compelled to make these advances.

What is the situation at the present time? Every State has at least one great school, and some of them four or five, which are using the same class of experts that are demanded and referred to in this bill for the use of the Agricultural Department. Besides that, the great commercial enterprises of the United States, some of them with capitalization of tens and even hundreds of millions of dollars, are demanding the very best talent, no matter what may be paid for it. If we desire to secure and keep a class of men that ought to be placed at the head of the Government service, we must make these increases in salaries. We know now that even with an increase to $6,500, provided in this bill temporarily, men whom we desire have refused to come, because they say that that salary may be changed next year. They want at least a reasonable chance of security in their tenure for a few years, because they can secure that elsewhere. They can go to these schools and get $6,500 a year with an assurance, and usually a contract, for five years' time; and if we do not pass this legislation, having made only an increase to $6,500 a year for a limited time, we can not get the men to fill these places. They must have some assurance of stability. Therefore it is necessary in our own interest and in the interest of this great department of ours that we should do this thing. Has this confidence which we have reposed in the Secretary ever been misplaced? I said the other day, and I repeat it now, I challenge any gentleman to show where in any one instance during all these years there has been a single man employed who was not qualified for the position. On the contrary, men have been taken from the department every year because they have been offered greater and larger salaries.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the eloquent gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] seems to think that whenever Members of the House venture to oppose a bill brought in from the Committee on Agriculture such opposition indicates a hostile attitude to the farmers and to the committee. I want to make it plain that I am not critical of the Committee on Agriculture. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] were the only member of it I might be somewhat critical, though I do not know that I would be; but the gentleman from Kansas, able though he is and eloquent, happens not to be all of the committee. Nothing that I say is critical of the committee. The gentleman from Kansas devoted all of his argument as a reason for the passage of this legislation to the fact that the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture does not have legal talent competent to cope with the able lawyers that represent the other side in litigation. If that be true, why has the gentleman from Kansas not busied himself to correct the situation? There is nothing in this bill that I know of that has anything to do with that particular matter.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. When I conclude this statement I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] said why limit the Department of Agriculture in these expenditures when we do not limit anyone else? Gentlemen of the committee know that it is the settled policy of Congress—at least since the war closed—that when we grant one of these lump-sum appropriations in every case to impose a limit on the expenditures. We have just passed recently the appropriation bill for the Executive Office and sundry independent offices. I find in that bill a lump-sum appropriation for the Housing Corporation, and on page 15 of the bill is a provision that no person shall be employed thereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $5,000 per annum.

On the next page is an appropriation for the Government hotels of $800,000, with this limitation: "Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $5,000 per annum." Now, over here in the Emergency Shipping Corporation appropriation, on page 40 of the bill, we find this limitation: "No officer or employee of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be paid a salary or compensation at a rate per annum in excess of $11,000, except the following: Six at not to exceed $25,000 each and two at not to exceed $20,000 each." And all the Members on this side of the House—the Democratic side—with but few exceptions, did the best we could to still further economize on these high salaries, but we did not get much help from the Republican side of the House. I am wondering if we got any help from some of the gentlemen who now quarrel with us because we are seeking to place limitations upon an agricultural appropriation bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know we Members do not get much credit in making economy fights in the House. I am not here to strive for credit and praise and favorable publicity. I am here to do my duty as I see it, and I am going to do and let consequences take care of themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the particular application of these increases. If the increases were simply administrative or to facilitate a going concern, and that was the nature of them, I would not be so much concerned about the measure of increase, but that is not this case. This particular case deals with a fundamental increase of production. It has to do with the food supply. It is dealing with the heads of the various bureaus who are in the research department of the Government. It is not a difficult thing to keep a going concern going, but it is a difficult thing to find out information that is not yet known and thereby increase the sum total of important knowledge. In that sense, therefore, this particular relief is going directly to the research man, to the scientific man, to the employment of our most valuable talent. I do not want to be regarded as hypercritical in my observations upon the character of opposition to the bill which criticized an increase like this. In fact, I think that the membership of the House really does serve a good purpose in resisting large increases, since there is a persistent pressure from all sides for increases. I sympathize with those Members who resist this pressure generally, but here is a sort of an increase that ought not to be resisted. Let me illustrate what I mean. Only recently we lost one of our best research men. We lost the director of one of our most important bureaus in the Capital, one whose work in 21 years has developed to a rank that has called the attention of research men from all the world. I refer to the Bureau of Standards. That director received when he left us the same salary he received 10 years ago. He was not mercenary. He did not go simply because there was a very large increase. We recognize the difficulty of getting the sort of increase in salaries applicable to this sort of service, namely, research; but it was a magnificent compliment to our Government when a research institution in another quarter of the country offered him over four times in salary what the Government had been paying him for the last 10 years, and nobody criticizes him because he accepted that offer. A reasonable increase by us would likely result in his remaining in the place to which he was devoted. Now we, of course, can not meet that competition; nobody would think of it; but the facts are that private enterprises and private businesses, alive to the great value of such talent, are ever alert seeking out the research men at the head of the various departments of the Government in this and that industry, and in this manner drain our Government supply of the best trained men we have, and will continue to do so unless we can show some sympathetic response to their needs as will be expressed by like services in industries differing from the Government.

We are losing and will continue to lose the best men, and we are losing them not because they are dominated purely by a money consideration but because we fail to show a different attitude toward investigational ability, which displays the lack of appreciation toward our research men and work. This observation applies to the director of scientific work, as provided in this bill. He ought to be a very high-grade man. It also applies to the superintendent or director of the Bureau of Animal Industry. Think of the remarkable growth in the assembling of a body of knowledge on that subject since the Agricultural Department has been established! You might say the same thing of the Bureau of Plant Industry and the several other investigational bureaus. I am amazed, really, at the small salary we provide for the Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey. My friend across the way here, Doctor LOWREY, will recognize that there is one of the greatest fields, when viewed from the range of possible investigation and research, now fronting the world, and look at the salary we pay for that man!

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am in favor, I will say to my friend from Ohio, of these increases, but why discriminate against the Chief of the Biological Survey in giving a salary of $4,500?

Mr. FESS. I am in sympathy with my friend with respect to that, but I do not know how to allot these salaries; I do not know how to classify them. But I do know it would be a compliment to the greatest Nation if we would show a little better appreciation of the research man who finds out the things that are not yet known, the real measure of a nation's progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I will ask for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Only a few years ago there was a gentleman working in the Bureau of Mines in our Capital. He had to work under a contract that any discovery that he might make would have to go to the benefit of the Government, which, of course, was proper. That man made a discovery in the constituents of crude oil that by a scientific application of his discovery had so increased the gasoline content that I will say to my friends that it is asserted by high authority that one discovery will be enough in the increase of the wealth of the country to pay for the Bureau of Mines, all told, administration, and so forth, for the next score of years, and yet he got nothing but a nominal salary from the Government. He attached himself to the research work of the Government because of his intense love of scientific research. He remained until the outside world claimed him for a field wider than the Government would supply.

I do not complain because he got nothing for his discovery, as perhaps he should not have gotten anything for it. He did it from the love of research, and the Government got the benefit of it. It was a tremendously important discovery, and I simply urge that we ought to appreciate the value of the research men who are at the head of these departments.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, may we have that again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Strike out "$6,500" in the Haugen amendment and insert "$6,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 10.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the salaries per annum of the following officers in the Department of Agriculture shall not exceed as follows:

Director of Scientific Work, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Forestry, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Markets, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, $4,500; Chief of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements, $4,000; Librarian, $2,500.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 2, strike out the matter in lines 1 to 10, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Assistant Secretary, $7,500; Director of Scientific Work, $6,500; Director of Regulatory Work, $6,500; Director of Extension Service, $6,500; Solicitor, $6,500; Chief of the Weather Bureau, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, $6,500; Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, $6,500; Forester, $6,500; Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, $6,500; Chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, $6,500; Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, $6,500; Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, $6,500; Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, $6,000; Chief of the Bureau of Soils, $5,500; Chief of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements, $4,500; Librarian, $3,600: Provided, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, in his discretion and if he deems it necessary or expedient, to pay, from the lump-sum appropriations made in the Agricultural appropriation act for said fiscal year, the additional amounts required over the salaries provided by said act to carry into effect the rates specified by this section."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will have an opportunity to offer that amendment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has the floor.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment increases the salaries over the salaries carried in the bill as follows: The Director of Scientific Work, from $6,000, as carried in the bill, to $6,500; the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, from $6,000 to $6,500; the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, from $6,000 to $6,500; the Forester, from $6,000 to $6,500; the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, from $6,000 to $6,500; the Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, from $4,500 to $6,000; the librarian, from $2,500 to $3,600; the chief of accounts, from $4,000 to $4,500; and it adds to the bill the following increases: To the Assistant Secretary, an increase from $5,000 to $7,500; the director of regulatory work, from $5,000 to $6,500; the director of extension service, from $5,000 to $6,500; the Solicitor, from $5,000 to $6,500; the Chief of Agricultural Economics, from $5,000 to $6,500; the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, from $6,000 to $6,500; the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, from $5,000 to $6,500; and the Chief of the Bureau of Soils, from $5,000 to $5,500. These are all increases recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture and unanimously agreed to by the committee.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Strike out, in the Haugen amendment, "$6,000," salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, and insert "$6,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is a point of order pending, so that his amendment may be read for information only.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Very well.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, if there is a point of order pending, I ask for the regular order. Let us pass on it now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that the proposed substitute is not germane to the bill or to the substitute for section 1 heretofore adopted, for the reason that the bill as originally introduced, so far as increases of salaries are concerned, relates to the salaries of those engaged in scientific research. The whole bill is predicated upon the idea that the heads of these respective bureaus should have their salaries increased because they are connected with scientific research. Now we have the chairman of the committee offering something entirely different from that which was submitted originally in the committee report, and that is to increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary. If you can increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary, you can increase the salary of the Secretary, or you might just as well increase the salaries of employees. Where a bill in its general scope or a committee amendment is limited to a certain class of employees, namely, bureau chiefs or those engaged in scientific endeavor, no one can hold that you may by amendment provide increases of departmental heads or subordinate employees. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the pending amendment provides an increase of salary to the Assistant Secretary from the $5,000 that he is now receiving to $7,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman say that the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture is not an officer in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. STAFFORD. I could not say that he is not an officer, no. I claim that the text of the bill is limited merely to the directors of scientific work and the other enumerated heads.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ASWELL. Has the gentleman any information to prove that the Assistant Secretary is not a scientist?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. ASWELL. How does the gentleman know he is not a scientist?

Mr. STAFFORD. Those who held the position before were not scientists. I am not as well acquainted with the inner workings of the Department of Agriculture as is the illustrious gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Suppose this bill were predicated upon the idea that it was intended to increase the salaries of men engaged in scientific research only, what rule of the House is there which would be violated by an amendment to increase the salaries of some who were not scientific employees?

Mr. STAFFORD. The rule that it is not germane to what is before the House for consideration.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It is germane to a bill "relating to the Department of Agriculture," which is what this bill is.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the Assistant Secretary is a scientist. That was so stated before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This is a bill the title of which is "Relating to the Department of Agriculture." Section 1 attempts to increase the maximum salaries of certain scientific investigators and employees engaged in scientific work.

Section 2 of the bill relates to the salaries of certain officials described as "officers in the Department of Agriculture," making no reference whatever to whether they are scientific or other officers. The only question, then, is whether the officers included in the amendment are officers in the Department of Agriculture. If so, the amendment is germane to the second section of the bill, which is the section to which the amendment is offered. It would seem to be clear that they are officers in the Department of Agriculture. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH to the amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: In line 9 of the Haugen amendment, strike out "$6,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,500."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand why the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAUGEN], in offering his amendment, should discriminate against one of the most important bureaus in the Department of Agriculture, namely, the Bureau of Biological Survey.

Mr. HAUGEN. The committee acted on the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture. The present salary of the Director of the Bureau of Biological Survey is $4,000, and it is proposed to increase it to $6,000. That is an increase of $2,000, which seems to be a very liberal increase. I agree with the gentleman that Doctor Nelson is a most exceptional man, but the committee thought they should defer to the judgment of the Secretary in the matter. We have given a very liberal increase, which we believe will be quite acceptable.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry is a very efficient man and he is getting an increase. I grant that he should have an increase. Likewise the Chief of Plant Industry and the other gentlemen who are getting $6,500 are all good men. But here is one of the most important bureaus down there, and Doctor Nelson is one of the most efficient men in the department. You are discriminating against him and giving the heads of other departments $500 more than you are giving Doctor Nelson, who has been there for many years and who is doing work of great value to farmers and stockmen in destroying rodents and predatory animals all over the West and saving the farmer and live-stock producer thousands. I agree with the chairman of the committee and with the Secretary of Agriculture that Doctor Nelson is a splendid man, and I do not think you should discriminate against him.

Mr. HAUGEN. We give Doctor Nelson $500 more than we give to Doctor Whitney, of the Bureau of Soils, the present salary of each being $4,000.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to say to the gentleman that a great many of my colleagues do not agree with me as to the work of these scientific investigators. A great many years ago we old cowmen out in the sticks used to say that a little tick that alighted on an animal and bit that animal did not produce fever, but when we lost an entire herd we were convinced that there was something wrong with that tick.

Then a man from the Department of Agriculture showed us how to destroy the tick by a dip in which we immersed our cattle and destroyed the fever tick and cleaned up three-quarters of my State and advanced the price of cattle about $5 a head in the clean territory. For this reason I say the scientific investigators do a great work for the stockmen and the farmer. Here is Doctor Nelson, who has been there for many years devoting his entire time and thought to the work, and yet you are discriminating against him in the sum of $500 in other departments. I do not want you to get the idea that I do not believe that the other gentlemen are entitled to the increase, but they are no more entitled to it than is Doctor Nelson. I want to say that the farmers of my district, some of them, who wear high-heeled boots and ride the double-shovel plow with spurs, are in favor of these increases and would vote for the increase of salary to get the best talent obtainable. Talk about the stockyard companies, we all know that they were charging live-stock shippers $1.50 a bale for prairie hay that they purchased for 50 cents a bale. But they are not doing that now.

Since we passed the packers and stockyards' control act they tried to destroy the act by employing some of the best legal talent in the United States, but this Government was able to cope with them; the Agricultural Department was able to cope with them. We had an Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, that was able to cope with them in the former administration, and he got a decree against the stockyards and packers that saved the consumer thousands. It is necessary to employ good talent, and I am in favor of appropriating the money to get it. [Applause.]

I agree with Mr. HAUGEN, my friend the chairman, on these raises, except the Chief of Biological Survey. He should have as much as the other department heads. They are all good men and doing splendid work in their departments. I admire Secretary Wallace in his recognition of his department chiefs and requesting adequate salaries for them. Wallace is a good man and a good Secretary of Agriculture. He is doing a good work for the farmer, but he should have gone a little stronger on Doctor Nelson.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of a point of order, and I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think the sooner we get action and vote on this bill, so that the chairman of the committee and those having it in charge will not be able to offer more amendments in conflict with the purpose of the original bill, the better for the Treasury of the United States. We have just adopted an amendment two minutes ago restricting the number of those employed in the Agricultural Department receiving $6,500 to five, and here we have an amendment where it is proposed to increase the salary of 11 to $6,500. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], while the pickings are good, wants to increase the salary of a man receiving $4,000 up to $6,500, the pending substitute providing for $6,000.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Why should he not receive $6,500?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a special distinction that you wish to confer by giving him a greater increase than any other. Not content with the raiding of the Treasury this way by jumping doubly the number from 5 to 11, they are going to increase the salary of the Assistant Secretary to $7,500. It brings to mind the action of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on yesterday.

They introduced a bill in April, 1921, where the maximum salary of foreign-service officers was placed at $8,000. During the incubation of the bill in the Committee on Foreign Affairs the maximum was raised to $9,000. We had better hurry up before the session comes to an end, or they will get up to $10,000 and $11,000.

Congress started out with a policy of increasing salaries all along the line. There were some on the Appropriations Committee who were acquainted with this general salary proposal. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Wood], and myself in a humble way tried to stop the outlandish increase of salaries that would impose a burden of $50,000,000 a year upon the Government. Well, it went through like everything goes through when it comes before the House.

Now the dear farmer is involved. I see all about me a large number of the farm bloc; anything at all from the Capper-Tincher bloc, the famous farm bloc in Congress, anything that emanates from CAPPER and TINCHER goes. No matter how much it costs the Treasury if it comes from CAPPER, the leader of the senatorial farm bloc, or from TINCHER, the would-be leader of the agricultural bloc in this House, it is going to go. [Laughter.] I wanted in my feeble way to call attention to the fact that only a few minutes ago the committee said that five men only would receive a maximum of $6,500, and now, in the pending amendment, it has increased to 11. I am not blaming my good friend from Texas, while the picking is good, that he should single out a man to increase his salary from $4,000 to $6,500. But, gentlemen, let us hurry and pass this bill, else there is danger that the committee will increase everybody's salary in the department. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, of course, we are all much impressed by the statement of the "farmer" from Milwaukee. [Laughter.] Not only that but he is a great economist. Here within the last 10 days when the great sugar interests from New York came down here to loot the Treasury, my distinguished and economical friend from Milwaukee was right there with his scoop into the Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman then voted for the American Trading Co.'s claim and the Howell claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I did oppose and oppose seriously the subsequent claim which the gentleman failed to fight.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Because it had more merit in it than the other one ever did.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question very much whether it had; it did not have the support of any Secretary of the department as the first bill had.

Mr. KINCHELOE. My purpose is to get the gentleman's record clear, and, if I am not mistaken, when the ship subsidy bill was under consideration to take $50,000,000 more out of the Treasury, he voted for that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman is in error there, as he usually is, as to my position.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is a prominent member of the subcommittee that appropriates for the Army appropriation bill, and the Assistant Secretary of War gets $10,000 a year, and why should he have more money than the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because that went through this House with my opposition to it, and it became a law. I could do nothing else than yield to these raiders of the Treasury.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I wanted to file the gentleman as an exhibit of the raider of the Treasury on the sugar bill.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a Member of this House who has been more of a stickler about the raising of salaries than I have been. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] called up his reclassification bill to increase salaries, I voted against the bill, because I thought there were too many salaries increased, and here the gentleman comes now, when we try to put the Agricultural Department upon a basis where it will function for the benefit of 6,000,000 farmers of this country, and he is against it.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, if I am in error, the gentleman led me into that error a few days ago when I followed him in this same fight.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes; and my purpose in leading that fight was to rob the Appropriations Committee, of which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is a distinguished member, from the power of legislation; and I am going to continue to do that as far as I am concerned. I did not enter into the merits of the thing at that time. I am opposed to raising salaries as much as anybody in the House; but if you are not going to carry on the activities of the Department of Agriculture in a scientific, up-to-date, serviceable way, then you ought to do away with the Department of Agriculture, because you can not get the scientific men for these salaries that we have been paying. They have lost four in the last year. One of these men who left is now getting $25,000 a year in private employment. The Secretary testified only yesterday that he had five young men who seemed to be willing to agree to take these places, but when they learned that it was not permanent law, that it is likely to be changed in a year, they refused so far to take the employment. The trouble is this: You take young men who have graduated in scientific courses from these various universities, who are making this character of work a life work, and this kind of a job is not going to appeal to them, because it is not permanent; they do not know next year what they are going to get; and that is why it is highly important to stabilize the matter and make the scientific bureaus and Department of Agriculture more serviceable and proficient. Whatever salaries you fix should be made permanent law, so that the Secretary of Agriculture and those whom he employs know what they are doing. I do not believe these raises in salaries are exorbitant, and I believe the sums fixed are as low as you can get any scientific man to accept the job for; but whatever you do, let us pass some kind of a bill that makes it permanent law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That upon the written approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, and then only in the case of extraordinary emergency, not to exceed 10 per cent of any amounts appropriated by Congress in the annual appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office in the Department of Agriculture shall be available, interchangeably, for expenditure on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, or office: Provided, That there shall not be added to any one item of appropriation more than 10 per cent of such item.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has an amendment pending which the Clerk will first report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 2, after line 21, insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1923."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from California takes preference, and the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CURRY: Page 2, line 21, after the word "item," insert the following: "Provided further, That no statutory employee shall be transferred from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll and be given a higher salary than one he or she receives on the statutory roll."

Mr. CURRY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late. The gentleman from California has been recognized and had addressed the Chair.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I had started to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Was the gentleman from Michigan on his feet seeking recognition when the Chair recognized the gentleman from California?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have been standing for several minutes, and from the beginning of the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, I intended to make the point of order. Perhaps I did not speak quickly enough, but it seems to me I did. Not a word had been uttered by the gentleman from California in argument in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan ought to be recognized to make the point of order.

Mr. CURRY. I would like to have the point of order reserved.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. CURRY. I had been recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate had not actually begun, and that is the test. The gentleman from Michigan was on his feet, and it has been the practice of the House where a gentleman is on his feet seeking recognition for the purpose of making a point of order even though another has begun to speak, that the point of order shall not fail on this account.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Does the gentleman from Michigan make his point of order?

Mr. CURRY. I would like to have the point of order reserved.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I would be glad to reserve the point of order, but the gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make his point of order?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the gentleman's amendment is not germane to the bill. It relates to a matter that the bill is not concerned with at all.

Mr. CURRY. The section of the bill itself refers to the very appropriation to which my amendment is addressed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman's amendment cover only the employees carried in this bill?

Mr. CURRY. No; neither does the third section.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It refers to any or all employees in the Department of Agriculture who might be under other circumstances transferred from one roll to another roll. If it were limited entirely to those covered in this bill, it might possibly be germane; at least it would remove that feature of my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman examined the third section, and does it not apply to all employees in the Department of Agriculture? It seems to the Chair upon a very hasty reading of section 3 that it applies to all employees in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no question.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment of the gentleman from California does not go beyond these it would be germane, if the Chair is correct in his reading of both the section and the amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have not now in mind the reading of the section to which the Chair refers, but I do not recall any section that refers to all employees in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair is correct; the bill applies to all employees. It is clearly within the limitation. I just want to say to the Chair the amendment is clearly within the purpose of the bill. It is clearly germane; and for another reason it would be in order, anyway, in that it is a limitation.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, section 3, to which the Chair refers, is to another matter entirely. The section, if it shall become law, will permit a certain percentage of one appropriation to be transferred to another appropriation in case of emergency. It does not relate to the work or compensation of officers or employees. It does not relate in any respect to compensation of employees of the department. The rest of the bill refers to the compensation of certain of the employees of the department. The bill as introduced refers to the compensation of certain employees, but this amendment is applicable to all employees of the department. Now, in my judgment, the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is not germane to the bill nor is it germane to the section to which it is offered as an amendment.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment is out of order, then section 3 is not in order in this bill. My amendment seeks to limit what may be done with the appropriation that the appropriation for agriculture is provided for in section 3. Section 3 does apply to all employees of the Department of Agriculture, and my amendment is to prohibit the Secretary of Agriculture from transferring from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll and employ a statutory employee, give him a title and a larger salary. Now, it does not stop the use of the lump-sum roll, but it does prohibit the transfer from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll of an employee and give him a title and a salary. Section 3 embraces all of the employees of the Agricultural Department. If my amendment is not in order, certainly section 3 is not in order, and I shall make a point of order against section 3 if my amendment is held out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. A more careful reading of section 3 of the bill has modified the first impression of the Chair, so the Chair will read it in order that the membership of the committee may have it fresh in their minds. Section 3 reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That upon the written approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, and then only in the case of extraordinary emergency, not to exceed 10 per cent of any amounts appropriated by Congress in the annual appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the miscellaneous expenses of the work of any bureau, division, or office in the Department of Agriculture shall be available, interchangeably, for expenditure on the objects included within the general expenses of such bureau, division, or office: Provided, That there shall not be added to any one item of appropriation more than 10 per cent of such item.

Does the gentleman from Michigan say that in the two funds mentioned, general expenses and miscellaneous expenses, are included the salaries of employees?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There are appropriations for general expenses which are used to compensate agents and employees, and the special appropriations are also used partly for wages of employees—

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan, who has had experience on this committee, does the term "miscellaneous expenses" or the term "general expenses" include the salaries of the employees referred to in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I suppose some of the employees referred to in this bill—they are scattered all through the department—are paid in various ways, I can not tell how they are paid, but they are scattered—

The CHAIRMAN. Do the terms "miscellaneous expenses" and "general expenses" refer to special funds appropriated for two distinct purposes in the agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. My understanding of the meaning of this section is that, suppose a lump-sum appropriation were made for a particular purpose. An emergency arises respecting that work. The amount of money appropriated is not sufficient to take care of it. Congress is not in session. This would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to transfer funds from some other appropriation to take care of that emergency work.

It has happened, Mr. Chairman, that there was a very serious, unexpected, and unusual fire in a national forest; the money appropriated for fighting fires was not sufficient. The Secretary of Agriculture was able to get more money by transferring certain sums from other funds. When the foot-and-mouth disease struck the country a few years ago a particular fund for fighting that disease was not available; an appropriation had not been made; but the Secretary of Agriculture needed immediately a very large sum of money, and under the authority then existing—and some such authority is carried in almost every appropriation bill—he transferred money from another appropriation and used it there, and in using it he employed men and paid the wages of men who were employed in various lines of work and paid from various funds.

So that when the Chair asked what employees would be covered by this in carrying it out, I can not answer.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can the Secretary of Agriculture transfer any money from the Bureau of Plant Industry under that 10 per cent proposition to the work of the Bureau of Forestry?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not know how broad it is or how it is construed.

Mr. HAWLEY. It says that as to any bureau, division, or office he can transfer money "for the uses of such bureau or office."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. As the gentleman from Oregon reads it, it would not permit transfer of appropriations from one bureau to another bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from California.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment would not stop the transfer of these funds; it will not stop the employment of necessary employees. It will not even stop the transfer from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll. What it will stop will be the transfer from the statutory roll to the lump-sum fund and giving a title and a larger salary than is provided for on the statutory roll. I am in favor of this bill. I believe in paying adequate salaries for good work, but all positions should be statutory except those that are in fact temporary. If the Secretary of Agriculture needs more permanent employees than he has, I will vote for a bill to provide them if the bill is brought in properly. But for the last 10 or 15 years a custom has grown up in the Department of Agriculture of transferring from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll some persons to whom it is desired to give a larger salary. Then they fill up the statutory roll from the civil-service list. It does not eliminate the person employed on the statutory roll and transferred to the lump-sum roll from a civil-service status. He can be retransferred at any time. But it does give the Secretary the right to employ a great many people at higher salaries than are specifically provided by law. I do not blame the Secretary. He inherited the system. It is a bad system. There is no necessity for it.

My amendment will not affect the efficiency of any bureau in the Department of Agriculture. I would not do that if I could. A great many bureaus, in my judgment, are doing good work. But I want to stop that abuse. I believe my amendment is in order if section 3 is in order, and we ought to have an opportunity of considering it on its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that section 3 would have been subject to a point of order on the ground that it is an appropriation, but that has been waived by not having a point of order made against it, and therefore any amendment that is germane may be offered to section 3 of the bill. Section 3 deals with just one proposition, and that is the right to transfer 10 per cent of the annual appropriation, and it must be only in the annual appropriation and nothing else; 10 per cent of money thus appropriated for miscellaneous expenses may be transferred over to the fund for general expenses. It does not deal with the question of salary, and it deals alone with the annual appropriation—nothing else.

Now the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] reads:

Provided further, That no statutory employees shall be transferred from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll and paid any higher salary than the one he or she received on the statutory roll.

That does not deal with the question of transferring money from the miscellaneous fund to the general fund, and it does not deal alone with the annual appropriation, but deals with all appropriations for all time to come and prevents the raising of a salary. This is an appropriation section, appropriating money from one place to another. This amendment offered by the gentleman from California is a salary section, and it is not a limitation upon this particular transfer or upon this particular appropriation, but it is permanent law. I think therefore that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CURRY. Is not section 3 permanent law if it is enacted, and are not the salaries of employees in the lump-sum paid out of miscellaneous expenses?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You know how they have been paid heretofore; you do not know in the future.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] has said about this being permanent legislation. It seems to me it is not germane to section 3 at all, but it is legislation upon a specific and distinct question of limiting the department in paying salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. This bill, according to its title, is a bill "relating to the Department of Agriculture." It is rather broad in its terms, especially for so small a bill. Matters of salary are included in the bill, as well as limitations on certain appropriations and increased privileges as to how they may be transferred from one fund to another. The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] offers an amendment relating to the transfer of certain employees from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll. It seems to the Chair that the amendment as offered by the gentleman is not germane to this particular section. While it relates to the Department of Agriculture, and relates to matters which have been considered in this bill, at the same time it does not appear to the Chair to be germane to the matter contained in section 3. Therefore, as it is offered by way of proviso to this section, in the opinion of the Chair it is not in order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I reoffer it as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California now offers the amendment as a new section.

Mr. CURRY. Leave off the words "Provided, however," at the beginning.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Should we not act upon the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAUGEN] before acting on section 3?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair now recalls, the new section offered by the gentleman from Iowa should be last in the bill. It is also a new section, but as the Chair recalls it should be last. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CURRY: Page 2, after line 21, insert a new section, to read as follows:
"That no statutory employee shall be transferred from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll and be given a higher salary than the one he or she received on the statutory roll."

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, the merits of this amendment have been pretty well discussed on the point of order. It is getting late, and I do not wish to delay unnecessarily the action of the House on this bill.

The Department of Agriculture is a great department and some of its bureaus are doing great good, but there is a peculiar trait in human nature which makes it undesirable to trust any great power in any department of the Government or in any individual unless you expect the bureau or the individual to use it to the limit and then fudge a little bit.

For a great many years the Department of Agriculture has been carrying on the lump-sum roll dozens and sometimes hundreds of permanent employees. They are by indirection made permanent, although the appropriation is only from year to year. When it is desired to raise some particular person on the statutory roll and give him a higher salary, the Secretary of Agriculture at the request of the chief of the bureau transfers that employee from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll, and in some cases doubles or trebles his salary. We have assistants to bureaus in the Department of Agriculture for whom there is no statutory authority at all. It has simply grown up as a custom, inherited by the present Secretary of Agriculture from his predecessors. If he needs these permanent employees, he should have the courage of his convictions. I do not mean Mr. Wallace himself, for whom I have the highest regard, but I mean the Secretary of Agriculture, whether he is Mr. Wallace or his predecessors or his successor. He should come to Congress and say, "We need this many more permanent employees in this department." Instead of doing that, by these transfers they load hundreds of thousands of dollars and in some instances millions of dollars onto the Government pay roll without any specific authority of law.

This new section will not prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from employing all the people he needs and paying them any salaries he desires. He may transfer them from the statutory to the lump-sum roll, provided he does not transfer them from the statutory to the lump-sum roll and increase the salaries of the transferred employees. If this section is adopted undoubtedly at the next session of Congress the Secretary of Agriculture will come before the Committee on Agriculture and request legislation, and we will then know exactly how many people it is necessary to employ permanently in the Department of Agriculture and what their salaries are and what their duties are.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. This is a question for information. Would the gentleman's amendment forbid the Secretary of Agriculture taking some particular man of great ability now in the employ of the department and placing him in the list that we are providing in this bill?

Mr. CURRY. No. If it would, I would not want it adopted. Neither will it prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from taking any man or woman he wishes, who is on the statutory roll, and transferring him to the temporary roll, provided he does not increase his salary. My amendment will not prohibit promotion or demotion from one statutory position to another statutory position.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from California. Involved in this is a matter to which the Committee on Agriculture has given a great deal of attention. It can be seen that, there being two rolls—one the statutory roll, where the salaries are fixed by law and can not be increased, and another roll where the salaries are not fixed by law—there is an opportunity, you may say a temptation, to the Secretary to transfer an employee from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll and pay that employee a higher salary for the same or practically the same work.

We have made considerable inquiry in regard to that, to find whether or not the practice prevails, whether the Secretary often or rarely takes advantage of it, and we are satisfied that the Secretary plays fair and does not take advantage of what we may concede to be an opportunity for him to play unfairly. About four years ago, as I remember the time—

Mr. CURRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CURRY. Does the gentleman know how many have been transferred from the statutory roll to the temporary roll?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. To the lump-sum roll?

Mr. CURRY. To the lump-sum roll.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Within what time?

Mr. CURRY. Within the last five years.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; I would not undertake to tell the gentleman.

Mr. CURRY. There are nearly 100 now transferred, and there are some assistants in the bureaus who have been transferred and given the title of assistant without any statutory law for it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I started to say, Mr. Chairman, that about four years ago, when I thought this authority of the Secretary of Agriculture was being abused, or I thought there was an opportunity for abuse that ought to be removed by legislation, I offered a motion to recommit the annual appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture, and my motion involved the very idea that is contained in the amendment of the gentleman from California, but I did not make it as narrow as he did—that there could be no transfer whatever. My motion to recommit prevailed in the House and my amendment became a part of the appropriation bill as it went to the Senate. My motion to recommit provided that there should be no transfer unless other work was to be done of a different or more important character justifying the transfer and the payment of higher wages. This amendment of the gentleman from California would prevent the transfer of anyone, no matter how meritorious, no matter how great the need of the department for some man in a new position on the lump-sum roll. It would be an absolute prohibition against a transfer of any kind for any purpose or under any circumstances. Let me tell you a little more of the history of that matter that came up four years ago. I offered that motion to recommit and it immediately attracted the attention of the Department of Agriculture, and I had a number of conferences with the Secretary and some of the responsible men under him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I became satisfied that I had taken a wrong view of the matter. The Senate struck my amendment from the bill, so it came up in conference between the House and the Senate. It was therefore in conference between the House and the Senate. I was one of the conferees and in a position to exert some influence perhaps to insist on my amendment remaining as part of the bill and becoming law. After my conference with the officials of the department I was satisfied that I was wrong, that it might work great injury and injustice and embarrassment to the department, so I withdrew it. We agreed that the Senate amendment should stand, and that my amendment should not become law. My opinion of the matter is the same now as it was then. A man might be on the statutory roll drawing $2,000 per annum. There might be a vacancy in a position paid out of the lump-sum appropriation paying $3,000 a year, and the Secretary might find that that man on the statutory roll, very capable and deserving, was the very man to be transferred to the other roll to do an important work. If this amendment offered by the gentleman from California shall become law, it will remain on the books for all time, forbidding and preventing any transfer by the Secretary. It seems to me unwise from any standpoint. It would certainly embarrass the Secretary in his work in operating the department.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, this proposed new section I offered does not prohibit the transfer of employees from the statutory roll to the lump-sum roll. It does prohibit the transferred employee from receiving a higher salary after the transfer to the lump-sum roll than he received on the statutory roll. There is no such thing as a permanent salary on the lump-sum roll. The positions and salaries on the lump-sum roll are created and fixed arbitrarily by the Secretary of Agriculture, whether it be $3,000, $4,000, or $1,800, or more or less per annum, or positions and pay per month or per diem. There is no such thing as a permanent salary on the lump-sum roll. The lump-sum roll is paid out of annual lump-sum emergency appropriations, but many on the lump-sum roll who have been transferred from the statutory roll are made practically permanent employees without direct authority of law. The lump-sum roll is intended to pay only temporary emergency employees and not permanent employees. But it is used to pay permanent employees by this indirect method.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, add section 4. This act shall take effect July 1, 1923.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, report the bill with amendments back to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10819) relating to the Department of Agriculture and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 51 ayes and 6 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, presented a conference report (H. Rept. 1559) on the bill (H. R. 13593) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, which was ordered printed under the rule.

THE COAST GUARD.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly to have to come to the House again to ask that a bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, but in view of certain changes which we failed to make in a bill now on the calendar I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 4137) relating to the Coast Guard, be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I ask this in the name and by the direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill S. 4137 be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if it is going to embrace any salary increases?

Mr. HICKS. No; it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. HICKS. The subject matter of the bill on the calendar is the same as the bill I referred to the other day, when the gentleman asked a similar question. It refers to the Coast Guard.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Coast Guard ever get through importuning the members of that committee?

Mr. HICKS. It merely takes out one of the amendments that we included.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR LATE REPRESENTATIVE NOLAN.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, February 25, 1923, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of the late Representative JOHN I. NOLAN, of California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that Sunday, February 25, 1923, be set apart for memorial exercises on the late Representative NOLAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REFORESTATION OF DENUDED LANDS.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a letter addressed to me by the President of the United States, together with a copy of a bill to provide protection against forest fires and for the reforestation of denuded lands, and for other purposes, referred to in the letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to have printed as a public document the letter of the President of the United States referred to, together with a copy of the bill referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEFINING BUTTER AND PROVIDING A STANDARD THEREFOR.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12053) to define butter and to provide a standard therefor, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman surely does not expect to take up another bill to-night?

Mr. HAUGEN. We have only two other bills.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows the weather conditions outside?

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me suggest that the gentleman from Texas is a friend of the farmer. We have spent all of the afternoon in extracting money from the Treasury of the United States. Now let us do a little for Uncle Rueben.

Mr. BLANTON. How long will it take?

Mr. HAUGEN. It ought not to take more than 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That "butter" shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter, and containing not less than 80 per cent of milk fat and not more than 16 per cent of water.

Sec. 2. That the word "butter" as defined in section 1 of the act of August 2, 1886 (24 Stat. L. p. 209), and in section 4 of the act of May 9, 1902 (32 Stat. L. p. 193), shall be understood to mean butter as defined in section 1 of this act.

Sec. 3. That for the purposes of the food and drug act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L. p. 768), butter is the article of food defined in section 1 of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "centum" insert the words "by weight," and strike out the words "and not more than 16 per centum of water."

Strike out all of section 2.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-six Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The bill has been reported.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to establish a standard for butter requiring 80 per cent of fat, which is now the standard adopted by the Joint Committee on Standards and by the Department of Agriculture. The standard adopted about 16 years ago by the joint committee required 82½ per cent of butter fat. That was found to be an impractical standard and out of line with the existing custom in the trade, which is almost universal on the basis of 80 per cent. As a result the department announced that it would not attempt to enforce the standard of 82½ per cent, but would apply only that of 80 per cent, and on December 18, 1922, the 80 per cent milk-fat standard previously adopted by the joint committee was adopted and promulgated by the Department of Agriculture as a guide for officers of the department in the enforcement of the pure food and drugs act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice the amendment seeks to amend the pure food law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. It is a guide for the enforcement of that act.

Mr. STAFFORD. An examination of that law fails to show wherein there is any special food designated as to what is pure or impure, adulterated or unadulterated; so what is the necessity, when the department has the authority to determine what is good butter, to pass special legislation of this kind?

Mr. HAUGEN. The only regulation—as I have said the definition required 80 per cent by regulation.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the need of special legislation?

Mr. HAUGEN. What we propose to do is to write the definition into the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the need if there is a regulation to-day which has the force of law?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is to give it the force and effect of law and to make it conform with the laws of the various States and the general custom throughout the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are many other foods which the commission passes upon as to their purity or impurity which are not singled out, but are determined upon the edict of the commission in the Department of Agriculture. Here you are attempting to single out one single product, and what is the necessity?

Mr. HAUGEN. There seems to be a necessity for it. The bill was drafted and introduced at the suggestion of the dairy people and has the approval of the Department of Agriculture. The subject has been discussed in conventions and by the dairy people and finally referred to the committee to determine.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. LONDON. It seems that 25 States have a higher standard than 80 per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. But it has not been enforced. It is impractical, and for that reason it has never been enforced.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman might even go further. The courts, so far as they have passed on it, have held the present law gives the commission no authority to fix the percentage of water in butter. That matter has been before the court several times.

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill as originally drawn provides for a double standard, requiring 80 per cent of butter fat and not to exceed 16 per cent of moisture. After again conferring with representatives of the creamery people it was thought best to deal with one at a time.

Mr. STAFFORD. It seems this Congress is not strong for moisture.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. LONDON. What is this expression, "with or without additional coloring matter"; what does that mean, in line 8, page 1?

Mr. HAUGEN. Of the bill?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; "with or without additional coloring matter."

Mr. HAUGEN (reading)—

Butter shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, but which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter, and containing not less than 80 per cent.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that; but I do not understand the meaning of the expression "and with or without additional coloring matter." You are now defining a bill as something made from milk or cream and containing additional coloring matter.

Mr. HAUGEN. Most butter is colored. The gentleman understands when 80 per cent of butter fat is required and under the regulations of the Treasury Department only 16 per cent of moisture is permitted, and generally about 3½ per cent of salt is used, there is only about a half per cent left for coloring matter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I may interrupt the gentleman again. The gentleman from New York is, of course, aware, but may have forgotten it for the moment, that imitation butters are forbidden to have coloring matter, and this is to give authority to put a certain proportion in butter.

Mr. LONDON. Is the proportion determined by law or regulation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no regulation about it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Only a certain amount can be used. If 80 per cent butter fat which leaves 16 per cent for moisture, 3½ per cent for salt, and a half per cent for coloring, casein, and other matter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The fact of the matter is they would only use a very slight proportion.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does anybody desire time? If not, I shall move—

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Well, I would like a little time.

Mr. CHALMERS. And I would like a little time.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I want to make a short explanation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can not the gentleman do that under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for additional time. I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. It has already been read.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this bill I wish to take occasion to call attention to the fact that the growth of the dairy industry in Tennessee has been such that it now ranks third among the States of the Union in butter production.

There is located in the district which I have the honor to represent the largest cooperative creamery association in the South and what is said to be the second largest cooperative creamery in the world. I refer to the Rutherford County Cooperative Creamery Association, at Murfreesboro, Tenn.

This association was organized only about eight years ago, and during the first year the number of patrons were only 85, and such patrons received $25,000 for their butter fat. The production of this association has increased to such an extent that in 1922 the farmers connected with this association received $640,000 for their butter fat, and the creamery during 1922 manufactured 1,722,173 pounds of butter.

This butter was shipped to all sections of the country, North, East, and South, and this is the first creamery in the South which exported butter. They are not only producing in quantity but also in quality. I refer to this because it is a new industry in the South and because this association is operated strictly on a cooperative plan, which is being so greatly encouraged by the Department of Agriculture, and because this association is owned and operated by farmers without any profit to anybody except them, after deducting expenses. As evidence of the quality of the butter there produced, I may say that the "Magnolia" butter manufactured by this dairy won first prize at the Tennessee State Fair at Nashville, the Tri-State Fair at Memphis, the Chattanooga Interstate Fair, the Mississippi-Alabama Fair, and the Southeastern Fair at Atlanta, Ga., and elsewhere.

Now, the success of this cooperative dairy has been such that similar cooperative creamery associations have been organized in various adjoining and surrounding counties, such as Bedford, Marshall, Lincoln, Coffee, Wilson, and so forth. It has been a great source of ready revenue to the farmers of that section during the hard times through which we have passed, and it has been largely responsible, in my opinion, for the fact they have been more prosperous than the farmers have been during the same period in many other sections of the country where they have been dependent on one or two commodities.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is a misapprehension in the House as to how this bill is being considered. It is not in Committee of the Whole. It is in the House. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has control of the floor. If he yields time he loses control of the floor.

Mr. VOIGT. I understand we are in the House, and that if the gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question I shall be deprived of the opportunity of offering an amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes. If he moves the previous question all amendments will be shut out.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin be permitted to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin can have his amendment read for information, of course, but the Chair presumes that that is not what the gentleman wants to do.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let it be read for information.

Mr. VOIGT. I intended to offer this amendment and get 10 minutes' time, and then yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. VOIGT. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa if he will yield further time on this amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have only an hour, and I have many requests for time.

Mr. VOIGT. There are many gentlemen here who want time.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have agreed to yield time to the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BROWN] from his State.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, has the amendment been read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin submits an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOIGT: Page 1, line 9, after the word "fat" insert a comma and add "all tolerances having been allowed for."

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Agricultural Committee I voted to make a favorable report on the bill now before us. The bill went through our committee rather hurriedly, as it was claimed an emergency existed in that the State of Massachusetts threatened to literally enforce the Federal standard of 82.5 per cent of milk fat in butter, to the injury of butter manufacturers in general. It was stated that a stay of 30 days had been procured in Massachusetts, which had adopted the Federal standard, and that the difficulty which had arisen there could be adjusted by passing a Federal law making the minimum 80 per cent. I got all the light I could by closely following the hearings. I also telegraphed Mr. Emery, dairy and food commissioner of my State, who replied that he regarded a law fixing the minimum fat content at 80 per cent with favor. After the bill was reported I had some further correspondence with Mr. Emery and with Mr. H. C. Larson, secretary of the Wisconsin Butter Makers' Association, and these gentlemen pointed out that there was danger in the language of the bill reported in that 80 per cent minimum might not, in fact, become the minimum on account of the possibility of the allowance of a tolerance. I am convinced that this contention is meritorious, and that in order to make the bill provide for an 80 per cent rock-bottom minimum it must be amended.

The bill as now before us provides that "for the purposes of the food and drug act * * * butter shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter, and containing not less than 80 per cent by weight of milk fat."

You have already been informed that the Department of Agriculture has for some years fixed a standard of 82½ per cent milk fat in butter, and that while the department has laid down this standard it has never enforced it. The department has allowed a deviation or tolerance from its own standard of 2½ per cent and has never prosecuted anybody who had 80 per cent of fat in his butter.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I did not hear the gentleman's amendment. What does he propose in his amendment?

Mr. VOIGT. I shall come to that in a moment. We propose now by law to provide for a minimum of 80 per cent. The danger in the phraseology of the bill is that while technically it does provide this minimum, administrative officers, courts, and juries, following established precedents, will make an allowance or tolerance below this 80 per cent. In the practical administration of many laws and regulations providing minimum standards for food products in the United States, tolerances are allowed, and in my opinion as the bill now stands the 80 per cent will not become the positive minimum.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. The establishment of a standard of 82½ per cent was only an order of the department, was it not?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. In other words, it was not law?

Mr. VOIGT. No.

Mr. TOWNER. It would be perfectly proper under a regulation or order of the department to allow a tolerance, but certainly it could not under any circumstances be proper to violate the law by giving a tolerance below the 80 per cent fixed by the statute?

Mr. VOIGT. I will say in answer to the gentleman that as a matter of fact in the administration of many laws, not only National but State, where a certain minimum is fixed, tolerances are allowed. Suppose you make this minimum of 80 per cent here, and take a manufacturer into court who has made butter having 78½ per cent fat. He tells the jury, as they do in all these cases—I have had a little experience in matters of this kind—that it was not his fault; that it was due to the negligence of some employee, or has some other plausible explanation. The jury is apt to say, "We do not think he did this intentionally; he is only 1½ per cent short. We will not find him guilty."

The butter manufacturers of this country who have large establishments, expert employees, and fine instruments can gauge the fat in their butter to a fraction of 1 per cent. It is no trouble for the butter maker, with the means he has at his command, to hold his butter at a shade over 80 per cent, but the fellow who runs a small cooperative or noncooperative creamery is not so fortunately situated, and he is apt to suffer under a law under which advantage may be taken of tolerances.

In order to avoid this and to make the 80 per cent beyond all question the absolute bedrock minimum, I have proposed an amendment which no honest manufacturer of butter can object to. I propose to add to the bill the words "all tolerances having been allowed for." That language, if added to the provision for the minimum, will serve notice in certain language on administrative officers, judges, and juries that Congress meant that no tolerance should be allowed.

Ordinarily, if a manufacturer of butter wants to go below the 80 per cent, he must resort to trickery to get additional water into the butter. Butter made in an honest way will not fall below 80 per cent, and if we make this ironclad rule we are making a rule that any creamery man in the country can easily adhere to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose, but it seems to me that when by law you fix 80 per cent as the minimum you have done all that the legislature can do.

Mr. VOIGT. I can not agree with the gentleman. If we insert the additional words that I suggest, that this shall be the minimum after all tolerances have been allowed for, then we clearly state our purpose—

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. When you say 80 per cent, do you not exclude all tolerances and everything else that could bring down the butter fat content below 80 per cent?

Mr. VOIGT. No; because in the practical administration of laws of this character our own Department of Agriculture does allow tolerances below a certain minimum.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Is not that where they make regulations over which they have a certain degree of latitude? But when the Congress enacts a law and fixes 80 per cent as the minimum, and I assume subjects to criminal prosecution those who violate the law, then is not that all that the legislative branch can do?

Mr. VOIGT. The legislative branch can make this clear; this amendment can certainly do no man any harm. It lays down a positive rule.

There are a few States which have laws prescribing a higher standard than 80 per cent; some States say 80 per cent and quite a few adopt the Federal standard. Prior to 1921 a Wisconsin statute fixed the minimum at 82½ per cent, in harmony with the ruling of the United States Department of Agriculture. When the department failed to enforce its own rule friction arose, and therefore in 1921 the Wisconsin Legislature passed a law making the minimum 82.5 per cent, with a tolerance of 2.5 per cent, and added, "so that in no event shall the milk-fat content of said butter * * * be less than 80 per cent." I prefer that language to the language of the bill before us, but I believe the amendment offered by me will serve the same purpose.

Mr. LONDON. The committee says in its report that if the bill is passed it will do away with the impracticable and impossible 82½ per cent butter-fat standard. Why is 82½ per cent impracticable and why is 80 per cent practicable?

Mr. VOIGT. It has been found by custom and the general operation of creameries, not only here but all over the world, that a good, salable, merchantable butter will have 80 per cent butter fat.

Mr. LONDON. What is the amount of butter fat in home-made butter?

Mr. VOIGT. Homemade butter fluctuates more than that made by scientific machinery and processes. The average butter made by the farmer, however, has less water than commercial butter and more fat than prescribed by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS].

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not pretend to be an expert upon the manufacture of butter. I do know good butter, and I am opposed to lowering the butter standard. I find that the good women of my district are opposed to the lowering of the standard of butter, and as far as I know, those who are posted on this legislation have written me in opposition to the bill. The Consumers' League, the housewives, and the legislative committee of the League of Women Voters, and others are interested in this matter, and they are opposed to lowering the standard of the percentage of butter fat. If it has been the general practice to require 80 per cent of butter fat, and this bill will not lower the standard, I should like to follow the committee, but I am opposed to passing a law that will lower the quality of the standard regulation of butter. If the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] will take care of the proposition of tolerance and keep the standard up, and that amendment be adopted, then I would not vote against the bill. I shall vote against the bill or against any amendment if it would lower the standard of butter that is now authorized by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Who demands this legislation?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not know.

Mr. HAUGEN. When the gentleman is through, I will tell him.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CHALMERS. Let the gentleman from Iowa first make his explanation.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] stated that the Department of Agriculture had adopted a standard of 82½ per cent. The department has never enforced the standard of 82½ per cent. The joint committee agreed on that standard, but the department found it to be impractical and announced that it would not attempt to enforce the standard determined by the commission. It was found out of line with the general custom in the trade, and for that reason the 82½ per cent standard has never been enforced. We have actually had this 80 per cent requirement all of these 16 years notwithstanding the finding of the commission. On the 18th of December the joint commission's new definition was adopted and promulgated by the Department of Agriculture. It requires 80 per cent of butter fat, and what is proposed to do now is to write the 80 per cent butter-fat requirement into law and thus avoid further contention in the matter.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. In case we make an 80 per cent standard, will there be a tolerance below 80 per cent?

Mr. HAUGEN. When did Congress or anybody ever say anything about tolerance being written into a bill?

Mr. TILSON. But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] said that the courts had held there was a tolerance allowed of 1½ per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. But one court might allow 1 per cent and another might allow more or less.

Mr. TILSON. But we can determine here whether the 3 per cent shall be a minimum standard, whether there will be a tolerance taken off, after we have fixed the standard at 80 per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill fixes an 80 per cent minimum standard. That is the way laws are generally written. It fixes that as the minimum.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that ordinarily butter is understood to mean the fatty content of milk. It is supposed to be all of the fat of the milk.

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

Mr. LONDON. What other elements enter into butter?

Mr. HAUGEN. Moisture, for one. I recall a statement made before the committee years ago that if moisture is reduced down to 11 or 12 per cent, nobody would eat the butter. It requires certain moisture and flavor to make it palatable. There has been some contention over the question whether the limitation of moisture should be placed at 16 per cent or at 14 per cent. I think all admit that it should contain at least 14 per cent.

Mr. LONDON. If the moisture is limited to 14 per cent and the fat to 80 per cent, that would leave 6 per cent for adulteration of the article.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; you have to add salt. Few people eat unsalted butter. As a general thing, it is salted to the extent of 3½ pounds of salt to the hundred.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is it not a fact that it is the intention of the Department of Agriculture to allow a tolerance of 1 per cent on this law if it passes? I have so understood.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; the department will do exactly as it has been doing for the last 16 years. This does not change it. It leaves it exactly where it has been all of these years.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. And why not accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT]?

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill was drafted and introduced at the suggestion of representatives of the creamery people, and as drafted it provided for a double standard, requiring not less than 80 per cent of milk fat and not more than 16 per cent of water.

Before reporting the bill it was deemed advisable to confer further with the representatives of the dairy and creamery people. In a conference with a number of representatives of the dairy people it developed that they unanimously favored the single standard and were in favor of the establishment of the minimum fat standard of 80 per cent; hence it was determined to so amend the bill to conform to the general sentiment.

In order that the subject might be given full consideration by the dairy and creamery industry, action has been withheld in order to have expressions from all parties interested.

The subject has been discussed in conventions and meetings by the creamery people, and my understanding is that practically all favor the single standard, requiring 80 per cent butter fat.

After the matter had been generally discussed the creamery people referred the question to the American association's executive committee on the subject of legislation for butter, and I am advised that the committee desired to unanimously ask for the passage of the Haugen bill, now pending before Congress, establishing a minimum fat standard of 80 per cent.

As before stated, the Department of Agriculture on December 18, 1922, adopted and promulgated the butter standard, which standard had been adopted by the joint committee on definitions and standards June 22, 1922, approved by the Association of American Dairy, Food, and Drug Officials October 5, 1922, and by the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists November 17, 1922.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 24, noes 35.

So the motion was rejected.
